

DATE DUE

Empty rectangular box for date entry.

STORAGE

KINN BROTHERS, NEW YORK

EASTON AREA PUBLIC LIB.

1901 9100 028 072 8

✓
NO LONGER PROPERTY OF EASTON AREA
PUBLIC LIBRARY

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2025

Sir WALTER RALEGH K^t
Captain of the Queens Guard Lord Warden of the Tunnages Lieutenant Governor of the County of Cornwall Governor of the Ile of Jersey &c

AMORE ET VERITATE

DE FIDE
VERITATE

SIR WALTER RALEGH

THE BRITISH DOMINION OF THE WEST

BY

MARTIN A. S. HUME

AUTHOR OF

THE COURTSHIPS OF QUEEN ELIZABETH

THE YEAR AFTER THE ARMADA

EDITOR OF

THE SPANISH STATE PAPERS OF ELIZABETH

With Photogravure Frontispiece and Maps

LONDON

T. FISHER UNWIN

PATERNOSTER SQUARE

MCMIII

BR163H

Copyright by T. Fisher Unwin, 1897, for Great Britain

FIRST EDITION, JULY 1897

SECOND EDITION, JUNE 1898

THIRD EDITION, FEBRUARY 1903

17186

' TO HER WHO IS THE FIRST, AND MAY ALONE

BE JUSTLY CALLED THE EMPRESS OF THE BRETANES.'

Sir Walter Raleigh.

PREFACE

It is fitting that a series relating the lives of those who have reared the stately fabric of our Colonial Empire should begin with the story of the man who laid the foundation stone of it. The prescient genius of Sir Walter Raleigh first conceived the project of a Greater England across the seas, which should welcome the surplus population of the mother country to industry and plenty, and make of England the great mart for the products of its virgin soil. Others before him had dreamed of North-West passages to tap the trade of the teeming East; of gold, and gems, and sudden riches, to be grasped in far-off lands; but to Raleigh and his brother Sir Humphrey Gilbert belongs the more enduring honour of a nobler ideal—the planting in savage lands of English-speaking nations, ruled by English laws, enjoying English liberties, and united by links of kinship, and allegiance to the English crown. To them, more than to any other men, is it due that for all time to come the mighty continent of North America will share with England the cherished traditions and the virile speech of the race to which Raleigh belonged. To measure the greatness of the world's debt to him it will suffice to compare the sloth and poverty of the Southern part of the continent with the riches and activity of the North.

Through all the stirring career of Raleigh, splendid favourite, successful soldier, statesman, poet, historian, philosopher, chemist, admiral, explorer and privateer, there ran, like a golden thread, shining brightly amid the dross that surrounded it, the inextinguishable resolve that the arrogant claim of the Philips to the exclusive possession of the western world, by virtue of a Pope's bull, should be resisted to the death; and that in order to make this resistance effective England must be supreme upon the sea.

To this ruling principle he devoted his talents, his fortune and his life; he was the apostle and the martyr of a British Colonial Empire; and this is the phase of his multitudinous activities in which the present short biography is intended to regard him.

His commanding personality, and the strange vicissitudes of his fortune, from the first impressed the imagination of his countrymen; and his life has been written so often, and so thoroughly, that there is little fresh material to reward the research of more recent inquirers. In 1733, before the modern methods of historical investigation were possible, Oldys, with marvellous industry, collected every fact then obtainable respecting the life of his hero; much of his information being derived from sources not now easily accessible. In 1867 Mr Edwards, with equal thoroughness and erudition, ransacked State-archives, official documents and private muniment rooms, for such information as they contained on the subject. To Oldys's Life of Raleigh, in the eleventh edition of the History of the World, and to Edwards's Life and Letters of Raleigh all subsequent biographers must perforce be indebted, either for direct information or for the indication of original lines of research. To a lesser degree acknowledgment is due to the works of Southey, Tytler, Sir Robert Schomburgk, Mr Stebbing, and especially to Dr S. R. Gardiner.

But however well gleaned a field may be, there is always some stray grain still to be gathered; and another Life of Raleigh would hardly be justifiable, unless it contained some new contribution, however humble, to the knowledge of the subject; some fresh fact, however small, which should aid us in arriving at a just judgment upon the extraordinary, and sometimes problematical, circumstances of Raleigh's career. It has always been known that he was deliberately sacrificed to the importunities of the Spanish Ambassador, Gondomar, and many reasons have been suggested for the Spaniard's apparent animosity. Dr Gardiner has to some extent lifted the veil, but the exact process and reasons of Raleigh's ruin by Gondomar have hitherto never been set forth in Gondomar's own words. It will be seen in the course of the present volume that it was no private revenge, it was no desire to inflict punishment for the injury actually done on the last Guiana voyage, that led Gondomar to hound Raleigh to death, for he was practically condemned before he sailed, but to serve as an object lesson to England that all South America, at least, belonged to Spain. The reason why the weak King allowed Gondomar to hector him into judicially murdering his most distinguished subject is also clearly seen in the Spanish papers utilised for the present volume, to have been a pusillanimous desire to curry favour with Spain at any cost, and to sell Raleigh's head at as high a price as he could get for it. Gondomar's letters at Simancas and in the Palace Library at Madrid place this beyond doubt, and furnish also several side lights which help to elucidate other disputable points. They have likewise afforded me an opportunity of including in the present work two important letters from Raleigh to Lord Carew which are not contained in Mr Edwards's collection.

MARTIN A. S. HUME.

LONDON, June 1897.

CONTENTS

CHAPTER I

	PAGE
DEVELOPMENT OF ENGLAND'S MARITIME POWER—ANCESTRY AND PARENTAGE OF RALEGH,	I

CHAPTER II

EDUCATION AND EARLY YEARS—FIRST PROJECTS FOR COLONISING NORTH AMERICA—RALEGH IN IRELAND,	14
---	----

CHAPTER III

COURT FAVOUR—POWER AND FORTUNE—RALEGH'S COMMUNICA- TIONS WITH THE SPANIARDS,	31
---	----

CHAPTER IV

SIR HUMPHREY GILBERT AND THE COLONISATION OF NORTH AMERICA — RALEGH'S PATENT FOR THE PLANTING OF VIRGINIA—THE FIRST VOYAGE THITHER—THE SETTLEMENT AT WOKOKEN,	53
--	----

CHAPTER V

THE SETTLEMENT OF VIRGINIA—TOBACCO—THE SECOND COLONY OF VIRGINIA — THE ARMADA — ABANDONMENT OF THE VIRGINIAN SETTLERS,	77
--	----

CHAPTER VI

	PAGE
EXPEDITION TO LISBON—EDMUND SPENSER AND THE FAERIE QUEEN —RALEGH AS A POET—PROSE WRITINGS,	98

CHAPTER VII

THE FIGHT OF THE 'REVENGE'—RALEGH'S PRIVATEERING EX- PEDITION—HIS DISGRACE AND IMPRISONMENT—THE GREAT CARRACK—RALEGH AS A PARLIAMENT MAN,	117
---	-----

CHAPTER VIII

GUIANA—THE FIRST EXPEDITION THITHER,	140
--	-----

CHAPTER IX

FRUSTRATED PLANS FOR THE SETTLEMENT OF GUIANA—SPANISH ACTIVITY IN THE REGION—CAPTAIN KEMYS'S VOYAGE TO GUIANA, 1596—RALEGH AT THE SACKING OF CADIZ,	169
---	-----

CHAPTER X

THE EXPEDITION TO THE AZORES UNDER ESSEX—DISGRACE OF ESSEX—RALEGH'S ACTION WITH REGARD TO ESSEX—ROBERT CECIL AND ESSEX—EXECUTION OF ESSEX—CECIL AND RALEGH,	200
--	-----

CHAPTER XI

THE SUCCESSION TO THE CROWN—THE INFANTA'S CLAIM—CECIL, HENRY HOWARD AND JAMES VI.—RALEGH MARKED OUT FOR DESTRUCTION—DEATH OF THE QUEEN—DISGRACE OF RALEGH—ARREST OF COBHAM AND RALEGH—ACCUSED OF TREASON,	230
---	-----

CONTENTS

xvii

CHAPTER XII

	PAGE
RALEGH'S TRIAL AT WINCHESTER—CONDEMNED TO DEATH—HIS PRAYERS FOR LIFE—REPRIEVE—IN THE TOWER, . . .	265

CHAPTER XIII

PRAYERS FOR PARDON—LIFE IN THE TOWER—THE SHERBORNE ESTATE GIVEN TO CAR—PRINCE HENRY AND QUEEN ANNE —THE 'HISTORY OF THE WORLD'—NEW PLANS FOR AN EX- PEDITION TO GULANA —RELEASE FROM THE TOWER, . . .	285
--	-----

CHAPTER XIV

DIEGO SARMIENTO DE ACUÑA, COUNT DE GONDOMAR—JAMES'S PROMISE TO HIM, ON HAND, FAITH AND WORD— POLITICAL INTRIGUES AT COURT—THE FRENCH AND SPANISH PARTIES—FITTING OUT THE GUIANA EXPEDITION—SAILING OF THE EXPEDITION—LANZAROTE, CANARY AND GOMERA— GONDOMAR'S EFFORTS AGAINST RALEGH,	309
--	-----

CHAPTER XV

RALEGH IN GUIANA—THE RIVER EXPEDITION—ATTACK ON SAN THOMÉ—DEATH OF YOUNG WALTER RALEGH—FAILURE AND RETURN OF THE RIVER EXPEDITION—GONDOMAR CLAIMS THE FULFILMENT OF THE KING'S PROMISE—HIS CONVERSATIONS WITH JAMES,	341
--	-----

CHAPTER XVI

GONDOMAR AND THE KING—RALEGH ARRESTED ON HIS ARRIVAL AT PLYMOUTH—HIS LETTERS TO CAREW,	365
---	-----

Sir Walter Raleigh

CHAPTER I

DEVELOPMENT OF ENGLAND'S MARITIME POWER— ANCESTRY AND PARENTAGE OF RALEGH

THE most striking development of national thought in modern times has been the almost sudden quickening of the imperial instincts of our race. There has been little excitement or shouting about it ; but the stream of conviction flows swiftly, and with ever-growing potency, that the stately confederacy of nations we call the British Empire has a future before it even more splendid than its glowing past, and that all its citizens from the highest to the humblest may with reason hold their heads higher as they claim their share in the glory of their common birthright. It was not always so. For many a long year we were so busy garnering the results of empire that we had almost lost sight of the means of retaining it. Over-prosperity, perchance, had softened our muscles and thickened our brains, and we were content for a time to continue to reap without sowing ; but the national awakening came in good season, and has braced us with the knowledge that the responsibilities of empire must be boldly faced if the pride of empire is to be preserved.

We know now that Britain must be undisputed mistress of the seas, or meekly take a secondary place amongst the nations ; and there is no divided counsel, no wavering faith amongst us as to the fulfilment of our duty. Our insular position has intermittently brought the fact home to us ever since we were a united nation. Every hundred years or so, the conviction grows irresistibly great, and leads to effective action ; but only if the material elements of effective action have been evolved during the period of quiescence. If during that period wealth has not increased, science has not advanced, practical seamanship has not improved, or the physical development of the race has decayed, then no amount of popular enthusiasm, however dire the need, will conjure up a great navy as by the touch of a magician's wand. Great navies, like great empires, are things of slow growth, depending for their very being upon previously existing material, and experienced knowledge. The great Portuguese African and American possessions sprang from the patiently accumulated elements, material and scientific, gathered at the instance of one enlightened prince from all quarters of the known world, through a long series of years. Seamen, navigators, cosmographers, astronomers, mathematicians and naval architects were all bribed to surrender their observation or their learning to the man who slowly built up a navy with the deliberate intention of founding a colonial empire for his country. But valuable as may have been the services rendered to Prince Henry's great plans by the wise men from afar, the ultimate success of his efforts, and of the subsequent triumphs of Columbus, depended mainly upon the existence of a school of fearless mariners who knew the sea and loved it, and the invention of the caravel, a form of craft, finer in line, handier in working, and swifter in pace than had ever been seen before.

The great naval renaissance in England, during the reign of Elizabeth, sprang from exactly similar circumstances.

During the lifetime of the great Queen the sceptre of the seas passed from the hands of Spain into the powerful grasp which has held it ever since, and the dramatic completeness of the transference is rightly looked upon as one of the greatest marvels of that virile age. But wonderful as it seems when regarded from a distance, the causes are perfectly clear. The Queen personally did but little for it, except in so far that her national policy gave all Englishmen pride and faith in their country, and that she honoured success when it came.

The Spanish Armada was not beaten by fighting

but by not fighting. It was the fact that they could not get at the swift, handy craft of the English which turned the proud confidence of the Spaniards into dismay and panic. It was the superior build of the English ships, and the greater efficiency of the English seamen, which gave Spain her deathblow upon the seas; and these circumstances arose from causes long anterior to the date of the armada itself.

The foundation was laid by Henry VIII. He knew that Columbus had offered to discover the new world for England, and had been repulsed by the cautious Henry VII. He knew that the Cabots had failed to reach Cathay by the west, and that if he was to secure his share of the spoils of the Indies—for it was no question of a colonial empire for England yet—he must have larger and stronger ships. He was rich, clever, and ambitious, and set about improving his navy. The royal dockyards were refitted: navigators, shipbuilders and cannon founders were brought from the English west country, from Genoa and from Portugal; and before he died he had the satisfaction of knowing that some of the finest ships that sailed the seas flew the flag of St George. An eye-witness of the attempt of Francis I. with his fleet of three hundred sail to attack the Isle of Wight in 1544 echoes the impartial foreign opinion of Henry's navy at the time. The English had only sixty ships to five times that number of Frenchmen. But amongst them were the Great Harry and Mary Rose, of nearly a thousand tons burden each, and there were many of those wonderful vessels 'such as had never been seen before which would work to windward with sails trimmed fore and aft'; invented by 'Mr Fletcher of Rye': and the English were so little dismayed, that great Harry, the King, had himself come down to see the victory of his beloved fleet. The watchword on board was 'God save the King,' and the answer was 'Long to reign over us.' 'You may believe me,' says the eye-witness, 'that one English ship was worth more than any five Frenchmen. It was truly a pleasant sight to see them anchored all in a line.'

The French did not enjoy the sight so much as the onlooker, and decided to leave great Harry's ships alone.

Then a period of quiescence came, and England's navy was allowed to rot in harbour. Somerset and Northumberland were too rapacious, Mary too poor, to spend money on the fleet; and in 1555 the Council was obliged to confess to King Philip that the English navy was unfit to put to sea. Even he saw that, at all costs, this must be remedied, and wrote to them that—'England's chief defence depends upon its navy being always in good order to protect the kingdom against aggression. The ships must not only be fit for sea, but instantly available.'

When Elizabeth came to the throne, the merchant navy of England engaged in lawful commerce amounted to no more than 50,000 tons, and the royal navy in commission consisted only of seven cruisers, the largest 120 tons, and eight armed merchant brigs. The navy was a mere skeleton; but the material was being formed in this period of depression from which England's future maritime greatness was to be built. The constant wars between Charles V. and the French kings had caused the English Channel to swarm with Spanish, Flemish and French privateers. Some bore letters of marque, some were mere pirates, but whatever they were, the sight of their easy gains and their adventurous lives fired the young English west country seamen, into whose ports they came. There were no sailors better than the Cornish and Devonshire men. Their voyages were the longest and roughest; for Falmouth, Dartmouth, Exmouth, Plymouth, Bideford and Bristol well nigh monopolised the over-sea traffic, excepting that with France and Flanders. The abolition of the fasts of the Church had immensely decreased the demand for fish, for the consumption of anything but flesh was looked upon almost as a sign of Papistry, and it was an easy step for the English sailors to take up such a profitable trade as piracy in exchange for fishery. Vessels of all sorts passed into the business; younger sons of county families, and even sober merchants, were attracted by the gains; and soon anarchy reigned on the seas. The race was with the swift, the battle with the strong; and only the swiftest and the strongest survived. The stauncher, the handier, the quicker a vessel was, the greater was its chance of success, the bolder, and more hardy the men, the greater was their gain; and out of this welter there arose such a race of seamen and shipbuilders as the world had never seen before. In the struggle for the survival of the fittest, Devonshire and Cornwall carried off the victory; and when the supreme effort had to be made, which was to establish the sea power of England for good and for all, the stout hearts, the keen eyes, the matured experience of these scourges of the sea, were ready to fight their country's battle.

The national policy of Elizabeth in adopting the reformed faith, and keeping Spain at arm's length, her aid of the revolting Netherlands, and of the Huguenots in France, had naturally led to a recrudescence of the persecution of English Protestants who fell into the hands of the Spaniards. The English sailors were of course those who suffered most, and their kinsmen at home at Plymouth, Falmouth, or Exmouth, gradually concentrated most of their attacks upon Spanish shipping. There were few country gentlemen on the Devonshire coast who had not a swift cutter or two at sea, on the look out for plunder or revenge; and the talk at the firesides of cottage and manor house alike, was all of daring and profitable adventure, and of the improvement of shipbuilding which made it possible. These must have been the topics which from his earliest childhood filled the eager ears of young Walter Raleigh. His father, Walter Raleigh of Fardell, had been thrice married, and had a large family—four sons and two daughters, Walter being the second son by the third wife, Katharine Champernoun, widow of Otho Gilbert.

Wonder has been expressed by Raleigh's biographers as to how, or when, he acquired his skill in maritime affairs, since he is not known to have had much practical experience in seamanship before he appeared as a naval commander of accepted authority. But, apart from the marvellous versatility, which enabled him, as one of his contemporaries said, to do each thing as if he had been born especially for it, love of the sea, and all that belonged to it, must have been in his very blood. Champernouns, Gilberts, Grenvilles and Carews—men whose names ring across the ages like a trumpet-blast in the ears of Englishmen to this day—were all his kinsmen. His mother's cousin had been that Sir Peter Carew, 'the prettiest man, and the finest seaman in England,' who had commanded the Mary Rose, and was drowned in her when she capsized off the Spit at the time of Francis I.'s attempt on the Isle of Wight. Sir Arthur Champernoun, his mother's brother, was the Vice-Admiral of the west country, in command at Plymouth ; and his Champernoun cousins were, almost to a man, hardy sea-rovers, gentlemen of long lineage and noble blood, sailing their own ships, carrying their lives in their hands, now searching for the north-west passage to Cathay, now swooping down and plundering Spanish settlements on the American coast, or carrying thither cargoes of negroes from Guinea for legitimate trade, now standing off the Azores to await the coming of the homeward bound silver fleet with King Philip's doubloons on board. There was short shrift for them, they knew, if they were beaten, but they took care usually not to be beaten. The Queen repudiated them and called them hard names in public ; but she was quite willing that they should continue to weaken and terrify her enemy, and enrich herself, so long as no responsibility rested upon her. Sir Humphrey Gilbert was Raleigh's half-brother, many years older than himself, and to him, perhaps, rather than to his greater brother, should be given the credit for the first projecting of an England over the sea ; though in his case, as will be told, the project was never effected, as it was by Raleigh.

Of the youth of few Englishmen of the first rank is so little known as that of Raleigh. Such stray hints as exist are mostly scattered by way of illustration in his own writings, and have been carefully pieced together by successive biographers. But, withal, the result is almost a complete blank until he emerges into the full clearness of day, already an acknowledged man of light and leading.

The family of Raleigh was an ancient one, although before the date of Walter's birth it had become somewhat impoverished. Walter Raleigh, the father, had ceased to live at his picturesque manor house of Fardell, on the borders of Dartmoor, two miles from Ivybridge, and occupied a solitary thatched farmhouse called Hayes, standing—as it still does—in a dip on the edge of the downs, about two miles through the wood from Budleigh Salterton Bay.

The house, of which the elder Walter Raleigh had only the remainder of a lease, cannot have changed very much since the boyhood of the hero. It can never have been a grand or imposing residence for so large a family as that of its owner. The country gentry had lived like toads under a harrow for the last three reigns, except those few who had succeeded in grabbing some of the Church lands; and young Walter Raleigh's earliest days must have been far from opulent. All that is known of his father is that he was a pronounced Protestant. In the Catholic 'Rising in the West,' his religious opinions nearly caused a premature end to his career. It was early in 1549 that, when he was on his way from Hayes to Exeter, he overtook an old woman telling her beads. Considering that the whole country was in a religious ferment, and that the city of Exeter itself was surrounded by the rebels, it argues more zeal than discretion on the part of Walter Raleigh that he took the old woman to task for illegally pursuing her Popish practices. She roused the congregation of the church of Clyst St Mary, crying that the gentleman had threatened to burn their houses over their heads, unless they would leave their beads, and give over holy bread and holy water. The infuriated rustics barricaded Clyst Bridge towards Exeter, and sent a body in pursuit of Raleigh. He took refuge from them in a wayside chapel, 'whence he was rescued by some mariners of Exmouth.' No sooner had he escaped from his assailants than he was met and captured by another band who carried him to St Sidwell's, where they imprisoned him in the church tower until the turmoil was over, and the 'Rising in the West' had been crushed at the bloody battle of Clyst Heath. It is a fact which appears to have been generally overlooked, that amongst Lord Grey's force, which so ruthlessly put down the rebellion, was a considerable number of Spanish mercenaries. This may to some extent, perhaps, have deepened the feeling of hatred which the people of Devonshire afterwards showed towards the Spaniards. In any case, the marriage of Queen Mary to a Spanish prince was nowhere more unpopular than in the west country, although the Catholics there were in a majority. On the premature outbreak and collapse of Wyatt's rising, the Carews and other heads of revolt in Devonshire saw the game was lost ; and Sir Peter Carew was carried by Walter Raleigh's ship to France, where, during the rest of Mary's reign, he was chief of the little band of English exiles who sullenly refused to be reconciled to their Spanish king. Foxe, in his Acts and Monuments, tells a story of Katharine Champernoun, our Raleigh's mother, which proves that she, too, as became her ancestry, was as strong a Protestant as her husband. In the time of the Marian persecution, a poor woman, afterwards martyred at the stake, was confined for her faith in Exeter Castle. Her name was Agnes Prest ; she was an illiterate, but steadfastly firm, woman, whose heroic adherence to her principles, in the face of great suffering, aroused the admiration of those who, like her, held to the reformed religion. To visit and comfort her was a brave deed, but Sir Walter Raleigh's mother did it. 'There resorted to her,' says Foxe, 'the wife of Walter Raleigh—a woman of noble wit and of good and godly opinions, who coming to the prison and talking with her, she said the Creed to the gentlewoman. When she came to the article "He ascended," there she stayed, and bade the gentlewoman to seek His blessed body in Heaven, not on earth ; and said that God dwelleth not in temples made with hands.' And, says Foxe, when Mrs Raleigh 'came home to her husband, she declared to him that in her life she never heard any woman of such simplicity to see, to talk so godly and so earnestly; insomuch that if God were not with her she could not speak such things. I was not able to answer her—I, who can read, and she cannot.'

CHAPTER II

EDUCATION AND EARLY YEARS — FIRST PROJECTS FOR COLONISING NORTH AMERICA — RALEGH IN IRELAND

THESE were the conditions and circumstances which surrounded the youth of Raleigh. We can only conjecture in the light of his after life the influence they exerted on his character. The younger son of an impoverished family of great descent, with all his kinsmen engaged more or less in the search for wealth and adventure on the sea, it is hardly wonderful that in after years the lustre of his genius should have been blurred by greed, arrogance and unscrupulousness. He was the child of his age, the same age that produced Bacon; when heroism and baseness went hand in hand; when that sweet persuasive Elizabethan English, which Raleigh managed in so masterly a fashion, could clothe wicked deeds with splendid sophistry, and black treachery could be hidden under fervent appeals to the God of faith and righteousness.

England had burst into a new life during the early years of Raleigh's boyhood. The conviction of growing national potency was running riot through the veins of Englishmen. It was a period of youth : ignorance had burst its bonds, and a fresh era of enlightenment and intellectual beauty was dazzling men's eyes. New worlds, enclosing untold wealth, unheard-of wonders, were being discovered by the bold and adventurous ; the limits of the universe, moral and material, were extending in the sight of men ; and Englishmen for the first time in their history realised the fact that to their country, to their race, belonged the coming heritage of universal greatness. But youth and ambition are ever arrogant and unscrupulous, and the Elizabethan age, with its noble ideals, its splendid promises, its great ambitions, its exuberance and its force, was a young era, and bore upon it the defects as well as the advantages of youth. Of its virtues, as well as its vices, Raleigh may be taken as the fairest prototype ; and any attempt to apologise for, or to minimise the more questionable side of his character, would lead to the presentation of an imperfect picture of the man, and the period which he illustrated. Raleigh was, it is believed, born in 1552, and until his sixteenth year lived upon the Devonshire coast, either at the farmhouse at Hayes, or at a house in the city of Exeter which is sometimes incorrectly claimed for his birthplace. He was a great reader, and must have listened many times to home-coming sailors telling thrilling stories of their adventures on sea and land, of their sufferings at the hands of the Inquisition, of the wonders of far-off countries, and of the boundless wealth of gold and gems to be won in the Indies by the bold and fortunate. Even thus young, he must have been eager for action. We are told by Anthony à Wood that he entered as a Commoner at Oriel, Oxford, in 1568, and stayed there for three years, looked upon 'as the ornament of the juniors ; and was worthily esteemed a proficient in oratory and philosophy.' This last may well have been true, but although his name appears as an undergraduate in the Oxford Register in 1572, he could not have remained at the University during the interval, and he certainly did not take a degree.

The first war of religion was raging in France, and Cardinal Chatillon, Coligny's brother, was at Elizabeth's court praying for aid and countenance for the Huguenots. The Queen, as usual, was diplomatic, and would not openly pledge herself, but was quite willing that her subjects should help the cause of Protestantism on their own responsibility. Gawen Champernoun, Raleigh's first cousin, had married Gabrielle de Montgomeri, the daughter of that Anglo-French Huguenot leader who had had the mischance to kill the King, Henry II., at the tourney to celebrate the peace of Cateau Cambresis. The connection, no doubt, deeply interested the family in the war, and young Raleigh must have left Oxford early in 1569, to join the forces of the Huguenots under Condé; for in the History of the World he incidentally states that he was present at the battle of Jarnac, where Condé was slain, on the 13th March in that year. Whether he continued in France thenceforward until the autumn is uncertain, but his cousin, Gawen Champernown, raised a body of one hundred western gentlemen later in the year to go to the aid of the Huguenots. They arrived two days after the disastrous battle of Moncontour; but according to Raleigh's own statement he was present at the battle and retreat itself, so that it is probable that he remained with the Huguenots in the interval. Thenceforward, for five years and a half, nothing is known of him, except that he was engaged in the civil war in France. The experience was doubtless a valuable one in every way. His remarks upon tactics in the History of the World and in his other writings prove that his marvellously receptive mind had assimilated and stored up the most profound lessons of military, as well as naval, strategy; and whatever else the long and cruel campaigns in France may have taught him, he certainly emerged from them an accomplished soldier at the age of twenty-three. But to be a soldier alone did not satisfy his multitudinous mind. Even whilst in France he must have kept his name on the books of his university; perhaps with the thought of some day returning and taking his degree. This he did not do, but in February 1575 entered as a member of the Middle Temple, having previously obtained admission into Lyon's Inn. When on his trial for treason in 1603, he solemnly protested that he had never read a word of law in his life. This may have been true, although neither on this, or any other occasion, is it safe to take his word with absolute literalness; for many young men entered the Inns for fashion's sake, as they did in after times, and he may well have become a member of Middle Temple in order to be near the Court, and to have an ostensible career. His brother, Humphrey Gilbert, had in 1572 commanded the English contingent in the service of the States at Flushing, and before Ter Goes, and Raleigh would appear to have served for a short time in the year 1577 or 1578 in the same service under Sir John Norris; but it cannot have been much more than a flying visit, for during a portion of 1577 he is known to have been in London, leading—if Aubrey is to be believed—a somewhat free and riotous life about the Court, apparently with a country retreat at Islington. Nothing is known of his means, but even already he must have moved in good society, to which, moreover, his relationship to the Champernouns and Gilbert would be a passport. For instance, in 1580, he had a quarrel with Sir Thomas Perrot, and both combatants were lodged in the Fleet for six days for brawling. He must also have managed at this time to fasten himself somehow upon the Earl of Leicester—probably he wore his colours, for hundreds of aspiring gentlemen nominally entered the household of the favourite, in order to obtain an introduction into the Court, and the support in need of a powerful protector. Thus far Raleigh's life is mostly dim and conjectural, but he soon emerges into the full light of day.

In November 1572, Humphrey Gilbert had returned with his men secretly from Holland, and after seeing the Queen, was told to go through the pretence of arriving publicly, but as if afraid to approach the Court until he had obtained her Majesty's pardon for helping the States without her leave. Her responsibility was thus saved, whilst her end was served. Gilbert was already a notable man on land and sea; and it was fitting that some reward should be given to him. In March 1574, accordingly, he joined with his cousin Sir Richard Grenville, Sir George Peckham, Captain Carlile, and others, in a petition to the Queen begging her 'To allow of an enterprise by them conceived; and with the help of God under the protection of Her Majesty's most princely name and goodness, at their own charges and adventure, to be performed, for discovery of sundry rich and unknown lands, fatally, and it seemeth by God's providence, reserved for England, and for the honour of Her Majesty.' They assure the Queen that they have means easily to carry out their project, and that the profits will be large. Here we have the first practical suggestion for an English colonial empire. It is no longer an expedition for trade, or gold, or negroes, but a proposal to take possession of lands—‘by God’s providence reserved for England.’ The matter was referred to a committee of the Council, who were at length persuaded by Carlile that ‘the northern part of America was inhabited by a savage people of a mild and tractable disposition, and of all other unfrequented places the only most fittest and most commodious for us to intermeddle withal.’

Ten years before, Captain Ribaut of Dieppe had sailed with a commission from Coligny, the Huguenot leader, to take possession of Florida, whether in the name of England or France is uncertain, but the Spanish admiral, Menendez de Avila, had landed and hanged every man of them, fastening upon the breast of each a placard, setting forth that they had not been hanged because they were Frenchmen, but because they were pirates. The French had retorted later by landing in the same place and hanging all the Spaniards they found there; ‘not because they were Spaniards, but because they were murderers.’ Thenceforward no further attempt had been made to settle any part of the continent north of the point of Florida, although the Biscay smacks were already finding their way to the rich fishing grounds off Newfoundland; and the theoretical claim of the Spaniards to the whole of the American continent had never been relaxed by them, nor admitted by the English.

In Gilbert's patent, therefore, which was granted in June 1578, he was authorised to discover and take possession, in the name of England, of 'any remote, barbarous and heathen lands not possessed by any christian prince or people.'

With Humphrey Gilbert in this enterprise Raleigh was associated. By the 23rd September of the same year Gilbert had gathered in Dartmouth ready to sail, eleven vessels victualled for a year, 'and furnished with five hundred choice soldiers and sailors.' But misfortune dogged the enterprise from the first. The Spanish ambassador looked on with jealous eyes, and tried his hardest to obstruct the expedition, which was to be piloted by Simon Fernandez, one of the best of the King of Spain's pilots, who had been drawn away from his service by Walsingham; and an Englishman in Spanish pay accompanied the expedition, unknown to Gilbert, in order if possible to frustrate its objects. Just as the expedition was about to sail it was ordered to delay its departure until some question with regard to the capture of a Spanish ship was settled; but it put to sea all the same, and Raleigh went with it on the Falcon as captain. Young Knollys, the son of the Queen's cousin Sir Francis, who owned some of the ships, began to squabble with Gilbert before the contrary winds allowed them to sail, insulted him at table, flouted his knighthood, and otherwise misbehaved himself. Whilst the expedition was beating about in the Bay of Biscay, Knollys deserted with all the men he could prevail upon to follow him, and went his own way. Then Gilbert had an encounter with some Spaniards, in which he lost a ship; and Raleigh was in great danger, many of his company being slain. Head winds at last drove them all back to Plymouth in November, where Raleigh, with the rest of Gilbert's faithful officers, laid a deposition before the Mayor against Knollys for his desertion.

By the summer of 1579 Gilbert was again roving in the Channel, on the look-out for plunder, when news came that James Fitzmaurice, the Earl of Desmond's brother, had started with a Spanish-Papal expedition to land in Ireland, and Gilbert was ordered to capture him at sea, if possible. He failed; but in revenge he swooped down upon the coast of Spain, in Galicia, sacked a hermitage, and committed other damage, and then returned to England. Whether Raleigh was with him on this raid is uncertain, but most probably he was, for we hear no more of him until the summer of the following year, 1580, when, for the first time, he received the Queen's Commission, as captain of one hundred foot soldiers, raised to fight the Desmond rebels in Munster. Gilbert had been President of Munster in 1569-70, during another attempt at a rising, which, by the means of the most merciless severity, he had suppressed in two months. His methods were a little too brutal, even for Elizabeth, and he was recalled; but, as we shall see, his half-brother, Raleigh, fully approved of his way of dealing with the Irish.

Raleigh's pay, as captain, was four shillings a day, 'not leaving him food and raiment,' and the work was hard and little to his taste, for he was ambitious for a larger field. Upon the Irish he had no mercy, and made no pretence of winning by any other means than fear. The Viceroy, Lord Grey of Wilton, was as severe as his young captain; but Raleigh's immediate superior, the Earl of Ormond, Deputy of Munster, an Irishman himself, was inclined to question the wisdom or justice of his methods. The first public act of Raleigh in Ireland was to join Sir Warham St Leger in trying and executing, at Cork, the unfortunate Sir James Fitzgerald, who was hanged, drawn and quartered in August 1580.

Philip II. had allowed to be fitted out in the Biscay ports an expedition, nominally under the Papal flag and commanded by Italian officers, but consisting mainly of Spanish troops, to aid the Desmond insurgents in Munster. The expedition arrived off the coast in the middle of September, and the men were landed at Smerwick, where they entrenched themselves in a fort they called Ore.

Lord Grey had assumed the Viceroyalty in September, bringing with him as his secretary the poet Spenser, who subsequently became Raleigh's bosom friend. Grey arrived at Smerwick with a few ships under Winter, on the 7th November. He landed his small force of about two hundred men, and some guns, and at once attacked the Papal force. After a few shots only, a parley was called. Grey feared it was a stratagem to delay matters until Desmond came up and attacked them in the rear, and refused to parley until the next day, when Alexander Bertoni, the second in command of the Spaniards, came out to crave quarter. He grovelled at Grey's feet and prayed for life. Grey asked him under whose orders he fought, and he replied, those of the Pope, whereupon the Viceroy answered that he would not treat them as soldiers, but simply as bandits. Grey demanded immediate unconditional surrender, and in his apology he asserts that no conditions were granted; although the besieged and contemporary Irish records assert positively that a promise was given that the lives of the men should be spared. However that may be, as soon as the surrender was effected, and the weapons of the intruders secured, Grey ordered the two officers of the day, Captains Raleigh and Mackworth, to put the whole garrison to the sword. Six hundred poor wretches were slaughtered in cold blood, and only two or three superior officers were held to ransom. Camden says that the slaughter 'was against the mind of the Lord Deputy, who shed tears at the determination'; although, if Grey, and not Ormond, be meant, it is difficult to absolve him from the responsibility.

His gifted secretary endeavours to justify the step in his View of the State of Ireland, by pointing out the difficulty of keeping so large a number of prisoners in a hostile country ; and it must not be forgotten that the rebel Desmond was only three days' march away with a force greatly superior in numbers to that of the English. In any case, it will not be just to cast blame upon Raleigh for his share of the carnage, although, with his expressed opinions as to the only way to deal with Irish disaffection, there is every reason to suppose that he approved of it. The Queen was, or pretended to be, much displeased ; and Grey's many enemies at Court, especially Leicester, made the most of it, and eventually brought about his dismissal.

During the winter of 1580 Raleigh was quartered at Cork. The Desmond rebellion still lingered, and all south-western Ireland outside of the English garrisons was honeycombed with disaffection. Raleigh, at Cork, was in the midst of it, and apparently considered that Lord Grey was not striking at the roots. The young captain was indefatigable, and gave the rebels no rest, night or day. On one occasion he rode to Dublin to urge Lord Grey and his council to allow him to capture David, Lord Barry of Barry-court, whose loyalty was more than doubtful. He was given a free hand ; but spies were everywhere, and Barry was fully informed of Raleigh's project. To anticipate the action of the English, he burnt his own castle and wasted his lands, and one of Desmond's vassals, Fitz-Edmond, lay in ambush for Captain Raleigh at a ford he had to cross between Youghal and Cork. Raleigh's escort was a small one, only six men, most of whom had straggled when the ford was reached. Raleigh suddenly found himself face to face in a dangerous place with a relatively large force of horse and foot. Almost alone, he literally cut his way through to the opposite bank of the river, accompanied by another young Devonian named Moyle. In crossing the river the latter twice foundered in deep water, and twice his life was rescued by Raleigh at the risk of his own. Then Raleigh, standing with a pistol in one hand and his iron-shod quarter-staff in the other, withstood the rebel force until his straggling escort had crossed the stream. Shortly afterwards, Fitz-Edmond, with other rebels, was present at a parley with Ormond and Raleigh, and ventured to speak of his own bravery. Raleigh told him flatly that he was a coward, for he himself alone had withstood him and twenty men. Ormond, jealous, apparently, of the imputation upon Irish valour, challenged Fitz-Edmond, Sir John Desmond, and any four others to fight him, Ormond, Raleigh, and four men of their choosing, but the rebels, perhaps wisely, shirked the encounter, and nothing came of it. On the retirement of Ormond from the presidency of Munster in the spring of 1581, the government of the province was entrusted jointly to Captain Raleigh, Sir William Morgan and Captain Piers. All the summer Raleigh and his little force of ninety men lay at Lismore and in the neighbourhood, scourging the rebels ceaselessly, until in the autumn he was able safely to return to his old quarters at Cork. Desperate as was Raleigh's energy in his service, how little it was to his taste is seen by a letter he wrote at the time to the Earl of Leicester. It has already been remarked that he must have attached himself in some way to Leicester's party during his stay in London. On the 25th August 1581, he wrote to him :—'I may not forgett continually to put your Honour in mind of my affection unto your Lordshipe, havinge to the worlde bothe professed and protested the same. Your Honour having no use of such poore followers, hath utterly forgotten mee. Notwithstandinge, if your Lordshipe shall please to thinke me your's, as I am, I wilbe found redy, and dare do as miche in your service as any man you may commande; and do neither so miche dispaire of my self, but that I may be some way able to perform as miche. I have spent some time here under the Deputy, in such poore place and charge as, were it not for that I knew him to be one of yours, I would disdayn it, as miche as to keap sheep. I will not troble your Honour with the bussiness of this lost lande, for that Sir Warram Sentleger can best of any man deliver unto your Lordshipe the good, the badd, the mischiefs, the means to amend, and all in all of this common-wealthe or rather common-woe.'

Sir Warham St Leger had now been appointed Deputy of Munster, and with him Raleigh apparently agreed better than with Ormond or Grey. In February 1581, before Ormond retired, Raleigh had not scrupled to write to Walsingham an impeachment of his general conduct towards his rebel countrymen. Ormond was far too lenient, he thought, and his kinship with many of the disaffected Irish was a danger. 'Considering that this man having now been Lord Generall of Munstre about two yeares, theire ar at this instant a thowsand traytors more than were the first day. Would God the service of Sir Humphrey Gilbert might be rightly looked into, who, with the third part of the garrison now in Ireland, ended a rebellion not miche inferior to this in three monethes.'

Raleigh, indeed, all through his career, seems to have been a difficult man to get on with. Like many men of vast ambitions, great vitality, and conscious genius, he was fractious until stricken with adversity, and even then his finer qualities did not appear until all seemed lost. His service in Ireland gave several instances of his daring. During his march from Lismore to Cork he learnt that Lord Barry was at Clove, with a body of several hundred rebels whom he determined to attack with his own eighty-eight men. He charged and put them to flight.

Thinking he had done with them, he went on his way with only six horsemen, the rest lagging behind, and soon overtook another band of Irishmen greatly superior in numbers to his own. They faced him and fought desperately, five out of Raleigh's six horses being killed. Raleigh being dismounted, was being overborne by numbers, when one of his men, a Yorkshireman named Nicholas Wright, coped with six of his assailants, whilst an Irishman called Patrick Fagan dealt with some more. Whilst still fighting, Raleigh noticed an Irish gentleman, Fitz-Richards, hardly pressed, and told the sturdy Wright to stand by him no longer, 'but to charge above hand and save the gentleman,' which he did.

His surprise and capture of Lord Roche in his own castle, surrounded by disaffection, was also an extraordinary feat. Roche seems to have been merely suspected, with little reason as it turned out, but Raleigh liked to strike terror, and although Fitz-Edmond, with eight hundred men, was, he knew, lying in ambush for him, he gave him the slip, made a night march with marvellous celerity, obtained entrance to the castle of Roche by a stratagem, and safely carried the nobleman and all his family to Cork, through a country swarming with rebels.

These and similar services were by no means kept in the background. On the contrary, Raleigh was very persevering in urging them upon his superiors, and claiming rewards and consideration for them. In writing on one occasion to the Viceroy, Lord Grey (1st May 1581), partly with this object, he made a suggestion, a few words only, upon which, curiously enough, all his future greatness was to depend. 'If it please your Honour,' he wrote, 'to give commission, there may bee another hundred soldier layd upon the cuntre heire aboute. I hope it willbe a most honorable matter for your Lordshipe, most acceptable to Her Majestie, and profitable to the cuntre; and the right meane to banish all idle and fruitles galliglas and kerne, the ministers of all miseryes.'

It is not quite clear what the proposal was, but from a marginal note of Lord Grey's it was evidently a plan to force the Irish to find more men and money for the English service. Whatever it was, Lord Grey resented it and snubbed his aspiring captain for a time. By the end of 1581 the rebellion in Munster had been got under. John of Desmond had been hanged by the heels at Cork, and his head sent to London; his brother, the earl, was a hunted fugitive, and the terrified kerns had been crushed into sullen resignation for twenty years to come. Under the circumstances it was possible to reduce the English garrisons, and Raleigh's company was disbanded, the captain himself being sent to London with dispatches in December, with £20 for the expenses of his journey.

CHAPTER III

COURT FAVOUR—POWER AND FORTUNE—RALEGH'S COMMUNICATIONS WITH THE SPANIARDS

RALEGH was now about to enter upon his splendid career as a courtier and statesman. He was thirty years of age, six feet high, his hair and beard dark, bushy, and naturally curling, his eyes steel grey, and very bright, though, to judge from his portraits, rather too close together. 'He had,' says Naunton, 'a good presence in a handsome and well compacted person, a strong natural wit, and a better judgment; with a bold and plausible tongue, whereby he could set out his parts to the best advantage.' Probably his persuasive eloquence was one of his greatest gifts, and his personal fascination must have been marvellous; for when he chose, which in his arrogance he rarely did, he could bring even those who hated him to his side. He took no care, however, to be popular, for he always scorned and contemned the people, and on the death of Elizabeth he was probably the best hated man in England. A good instance of this occurs in a letter from Dudley Carleton to Chamberlain, giving an account of the condemnation of Raleigh to death for treason at Winchester in 1603. He says that the two men who first took the news to the King were Roger Ashton and a Scotsman, 'whereof one affirmed that never man spake so well in times past, nor would do in the world to come; and the other said that, whereas, when he first saw him he was so led with the common hatred that he would have gone a hundred miles to have seen him hanged, he would, ere he parted, have gone a thousand to have saved his life. In one word, never was a man so hated and so popular in so short a time.' What was true of the matured genius in the moment of his adversity was equally true of the almost unknown young captain who came with dispatches from Ireland twenty years before. His attraction was irresistible. The particular plan which Raleigh had submitted to Lord Grey for increasing the English forces in Munster without expense to the Queen has been lost; but, whatever it was, Captain Raleigh lost no time in submitting it to the Queen and Council. It appears in the ordinary course to have been sent to Lord Grey for his opinion, and the irate Viceroy lost no time in making clear that he was offended at Raleigh's presumption. In his letter to Lord Burghley, dated January 1582, he says, 'Having lately received advertisement of a plott delivered by Captain Rawley unto her Majestie, for the lessening of her charges here in the province of Mounster, and disposing of the garrisons according to the same; the matter at first, indeed, offering a very plausible show of thrifte and commoditie, which might easily occasion Her Majestie to thincke that I have not so carefully as behoved looked into the state of the cause and the search of Her Majestie's profit.' He then goes on to say that he and his council having considered Captain Rawley's plan, have decided that it is inconvenient and impossible. 'I doubt not but you will soone discerne a difference betweene the judgments of those who, with grounded experience and approved reason, look into the condition of things, and those who upon no grownd but seeming fancies, and affecting credit with profit, frame "plots" upon impossibilities for others to execute.'

To Walsingham at the same time the Viceroy wrote bitterly complaining of the way he was being traduced and misrepresented at Court. Leicester was a strenuous enemy of Grey, and doubtless was not sorry to bring forward the brilliant handsome captain, just arrived from Ireland, who might be made his instrument for further discrediting the Viceroy. In any case, although no record exists of it in the Council book, and Naunton's assertion that Raleigh and Grey personally met at the Council table is incorrect, it is certain that Raleigh on this occasion first made his favourable impression on the Queen. On the reception of Grey's report there would naturally be some sort of consultation, at which Raleigh would be present, and it is possible that Naunton may have referred to such an occasion when he wrote, 'Among the second causes of Raleigh's growth . . . that variance between him and Lord Grey in his descent upon Ireland was a principal; for it drew them both over to the Council table . . . where he had much the better in telling of his tale; and so much that the Queen and the Lords took no small mark of the man and his parts.' Afterwards, he adds that, 'Raleigh had gotten the Queen's ear in a trice; and she began to be taken with his elocution, and loved to hear his reasons to her demands; and the truth is she took him for a kind of oracle, which nettled them all.' Doubtless this is true in the main, as Naunton of course knew Raleigh well; but it is loosely told, and in detail open to question.

The pretty story about the gallant captain spreading his rich cloak over a flashy place for the Queen to step upon, as told by old Fuller, has no other authority than his upon which to rest, but there is nothing inherently improbable in it. It is quite in keeping with the inflated gallantry of Elizabeth's Court, and with Raleigh's character. He was determined to 'get on.' His ambition we know was boundless; he could flatter and crawl as abjectly as the basest; he could hector as insolently as the highest. He had passed six years amongst French gentlemen, bred in the preposterous fopperies of the Court which Brantome describes so well. The trick of spreading the cloak was always a favourite one amongst Spanish gallants, and, of course, was well known in France, although apparently it never was acclimatised in England. It was just the thing to confirm the vain Queen in the good impression which Raleigh's eloquence and ability had already produced upon her, and even on Fuller's authority, we may accept the story for its verisimilitude.

He had not been in England many weeks before the first sign of royal favour reached him. At the end of March 1582, only three months after his arrival in London, he was appointed to the captaincy of a company in Ireland, of which the captain (Appesley) had just died; but he was excused from commanding in person, and was empowered to appoint a deputy. Shortly before this, indeed, he had been awarded £100 on account of his Irish services, to be paid out of the funds destined for the war.

This was gall and wormwood to Lord Grey, who wrote a vigorous protest to Walsingham in April. 'As for Captain Rawley's assignment to the charge of Appeslei's band, which in your letter of the 2nd April you write to be signified to me by a letter from Her Majestie. I have no letter which specifieth any such thing to me, and for myne own part, I must bee plain: I nether like his carriage nor his company, and therefore other than by direction and commandment, and what his right can require, he is not to expect at my hands.'

But Raleigh's foot was well in the stirrup now, and Grey's ire was powerless to hurt him. On the contrary, it is evident from a paper in the Record Office in Burghley's hand, that he was in October of the same year consulted as to the government of Ireland, and the suppression of the rebellion, and his recommendations were submitted to the Queen.

But by this time the Queen's languishing courtiers, who kept up the eternal pretence of being in love with her, had taken fright at the new-comer's good fortune.

For the last few years she had been playing fast and loose with the young Duke of Anjou, and flirting desperately with his egregious representative Jean de Simier, but she was now rid of them. Leicester's marriage, too, had been divulged to her by Simier a year before, and his position towards her in future was changed; but still her faithful 'bell wether,' Hatton, kept the old game going, and began to get jealous of Raleigh. Sir Thomas Heneage, another old flame of the Queen's, who had now dropped out of the active list of lovers, and was Vice-Chamberlain, sided with Hatton; and at the request of the latter handed to the Queen one morning in October (1582) a letter from his friend, just as 'Her Highness was ready to ride abroad in the great park to kill a doe.' With the letter were sent three tokens—a book, a bucket and a bodkin—presumably meaning that Hatton swore that if she did not leave Raleigh (whose pet name was ‘water’) he would kill himself. The Queen took the letter and tokens, and smilingly said, ‘There never was such another.’ She seems to have been too excited and pleased to fix the bodkin in her hair, as she tried to do, and gave it and the letter back to Heneage, until she could bring her horse to a stand still. ‘She read it,’ says Heneage, ‘with blushing cheeks, and uttered many speeches (which I refer till I see you), most of them tending to the discovery of a doubtful mind, whether she should be angry or well pleased.’ She decided to be pleased, and told Heneage to answer, ‘that she liked your preamble so ill, as she had little list to look upon the bucket or the book. If Princes were like gods, as they should be, they would suffer no element so to abound as to breed confusion. And that Pecora Campi (Hatton) was so dear unto her, that she had bounded her banks so sure, as no water nor floods should ever overthrow them. And for better assurance unto you that you shall not fear drowning, she hath sent you a bird that, together with the rainbow, brought the good tidings that there should be no more destruction by water. . . . You should remember she was a shepherd, and then you might think how dear her sheep was unto her. . . . To conclude, water hath been more welcome than were fit for so cold a season.’ Three years later, when Raleigh was in the height of his favour, the Queen again assured Hatton that Raleigh should not supplant him. She told Heneage at Croydon that she felt Hatton's absence from her side as much as he did, 'and marvelled why you came not.' Heneage let her know that there was no place for him to stay in, as his lodging had been occupied. The Queen flew into a rage at this, and would not believe that anyone should dare to occupy Hatton's rooms. She sent to make inquiries, and found that Sir Walter Raleigh was lodged in them. 'Whereupon she grew more angry with the Lord Chamberlain than I wished she had been, and used bitterness of speech against R, telling me before him that she had rather see him hanged than equal him with you, or that the world should think she did so.'

Even in that age of display no man perhaps was so gorgeous in his attire as Raleigh. Jewels, big pearls especially, were beloved by him, and wonderful stories were current in the Court as to the fabulous value of the adornments he wore; one writer asserting that the gems upon his shoes alone were worth 6600 gold pieces. No courtier was more gallant at tourney or masque than he, no poet readier to turn a stanza in praise of his mistress, or to devise a far-fetched compliment; but, unlike the other butterflies that fluttered round the Queen, he was far from confining his attention to these trifles. From the first the Queen had consulted him and employed him in affairs of State; great plans for the founding of an England over the sea were already working in his brain. He could dangle at Court and bandy compliments as well as the most empty-headed fine gentlemen; but he gave up only five hours of the twenty-four to sleep, and spent every hour he could snatch in study. His reading must have been omnivorous, for his breadth of view, his depth of knowledge, and his profundity of thought—far in advance of his contemporaries—prove him to have been perhaps the most universally capable Englishman that ever lived—a fit contemporary of Shakspeare and Bacon.

We have seen that from his first appearance before Elizabeth in January 1582, when he defended his Irish plans, honours and emoluments were showered upon him. In the beginning of the following month of February, the Queen had managed, by dint of bribes, caresses and promises, to induce the Duke of Anjou to leave England and embark for Flushing, where he was to receive the sovereignty of the revolted Flemish States. William the Silent awaited him at the landing-place, and some of the principal courtiers of Elizabeth's Court accompanied the new sovereign to his dominions. He entered the town in great pomp, with William on one side of him and Leicester on the other, followed by Hunsdon, Willoughby, Sir Philip Sidney, Sir John Norris, Raleigh, and many others. When he was crowned in Antwerp a few days afterwards, Leicester and the Englishmen were present. Leicester had tried his hardest through Hatton to avoid the journey, for he feared that the new sovereign might detain him against his will, whilst he pursued his love-making by letter with the Queen, undisturbed by Leicester's presence near her. So immediately the investiture was over, whilst the rest of the company was at dinner, Leicester escaped and sailed for England, leaving most of his train behind him. It suited the Queen for the moment to disclaim the investiture of Alençon; and Leicester and those with him were rated as traitors and rogues for having been present at the ceremony. William the Silent understood the position; he knew that Anjou was a helpless puppet in the Queen's hands; and when Raleigh took leave of him he entrusted him with dispatches for Elizabeth and her Council, and bade him deliver to her this message—'Sub umbra alarum tuarum protegimur.'

In the following year the Queen granted Raleigh the use of Durham House in the Strand, conveniently near to Whitehall and one of the largest of the riverside palaces, which for many years had been used as a royal guest-house. Here he lived in splendour until the Queen's death, having, as he subsequently said, a retinue of forty persons and as many horses always maintained there. 'I well remember,' says Aubrey, 'his study, which was on a little turret that looked into and over the Thames, and had a prospect which is as pleasant as any in the world.' All this magnificence, however, needed large revenues to keep it up, and the Queen was not fond of rewarding her favourites with direct gifts of money. She had other ways of enriching them, and these she adopted in Raleigh's case. In April 1583, the Queen induced All Souls College, Oxford, to grant him two beneficial leases of some property. In the following month he received a patent to license vintners, by which he was entitled to a half of all fines inflicted and to exact a fee of £1 per annum from every wine dealer in England. There was no pretence at supervision on his part, for he leased his patent to a certain Richard Browne for seven years at £800 a year. Browne was industrious in increasing the number of taverns, and was making a very good thing of it, when Raleigh claimed a larger share of the profits. This Browne refused, and Raleigh being unable to induce him to surrender his lease, he went to the length of getting his own patent revoked, and regranted for thirty-one years. He subsequently drew large revenues from it—he himself stated £2000 a year—but it involved him in constant trouble and litigation, for the patent was an oppressive and unpopular one, and in the case of the University towns interfered with old and powerful vested interests. In March 1584, a license was given to him to export a certain number of woollen cloths, and in subsequent years this privilege was regranted and extended. This again brought him into collision with merchants and shippers, who innocently, or otherwise, infringed his patents. It will be seen, therefore, that even in the case of a man less rapacious and extravagant than Raleigh, there was sufficient reason for his unpopularity, on account of these patents alone.

In the following year, 1586, the confiscated lands of the defeated Desmonds in Munster were to be scrambled for, and Raleigh naturally came in for the lion's share, although the actual profit to him turned out in the end to be small.

The province had been harried by fire and sword to such an extent, and most of the land itself was so poor, that Hooker speaks of it thus at the time :—‘ The curse of God was so great, and the land so barren, both of man and beast, that whosoever did travel from one end of Munster . . . to the other, about six score miles, he should not meet man, woman or child, saving in the towns.’ The problem therefore was to repopulate this wilderness, and the land—600,000 acres of it—was partitioned out amongst gentlemen who undertook to plant thereon a given number of well-affected Englishmen. It was enacted that no person was to have more than 12,000 acres, upon which eighty-six families were to be settled, but Raleigh and two nominal associates got three seigniories and a half, of 12,000 acres each, of fine fertile well-wooded land, stretching on each side of the Blackwater from Youghal. He also obtained a grant of Lismore Castle from the Bishop of Lismore at a nominal rent, and possessed a manor house at Youghal. Raleigh did his best with his vast estate, settling it with Cornish and Devonshire families, and introducing in after years many improvements in tillage and management, as well as first planting potatoes, but he met with constant obstruction and trouble, causing him endless litigation with regard to the estate. His occupations were many, and he was necessarily, for the most part, absent from Ireland. The prohibition of exportation of timber, pipe-staves, and the like, hit him especially hard ; for he had counted much upon the export of casks from Ireland to Spain. He had many a hard battle before he could get the prohibition even partially raised. He was in constant hot water, too, with his tenants, and with the English Viceroy, Fitzwilliam, in after years ; he was swindled by his partners and representatives, and his broad acres in Ireland brought him little but bitterness and disappointment.

Even a more important gift was that of the Lord Wardenship of the Stannaries, which he received on the death of the Earl of Bedford in 1585. The Stannaries Parliament of Devon and Cornish miners was held on a secluded tor overlooking Dartmoor, and here the brilliant courtier, the accomplished poet, the experienced soldier, the subtle statesman, became the Devonshire squire ; giving laws to his own people, and settling the disputes of the rough miners, in their own broad, soft accent, which even at Court he always retained to the day of his death. To this place of dignity was shortly afterwards added that of Vice-Admiral of the West, and, finally, in 1587, he became Captain of the Queen's Guard in succession to the forlorn 'bell wether,' Lord Chancellor Hatton. The post was a valuable one, although no salary was attached to it, except the uniform of 'six yards of tawney medley at 13s. 4d. a yard, with a fur of black budge, rated at £10,' but it kept him near the Queen's person, and gave him opportunities for asking favours for which he probably exacted large payments from the suitors whose causes he pleaded; as did, indeed, all persons in similar position at the time.

A still greater instance of the royal favour even than this came to Raleigh about the same time as the captaincy of the guard, under circumstances which, to say the least, lay him open to the gravest suspicion.

In May 1586, the priest Ballard had been sent by the English Catholics to the Spanish ambassador in Paris, Mendoza, with a proposal for the murder of the Queen, and a Catholic rising in England with Spanish help. The answer was vaguely sympathetic, but it was sufficient for the purpose. In August of the same year Gifford went to Paris with the full plan. They felt, he said, that war with Spain was inevitable, and that Elizabeth's reign was drawing to a close, and in order to avert ruin they had decided to precipitate matters.

For this purpose they had attracted to their side a large number of supporters who were not Catholics, but who were anxious for Mary Stuart to succeed. He gave Mendoza a list of a great number of noblemen and gentlemen who would welcome a Spanish force, and raise a revolt the moment the Queen was despatched ; and said that six of the Queen's servants, having constant access to her person, had sworn to commit the deed of murder. This was a repetition of Ballard's message in May, and when it came in its more authoritative form it was cautiously welcomed by Philip. It is useless to remind the reader that the main threads of the conspiracy were all in Walsingham's hands from the first, and that before Philip's reply could reach them Babington and his principal associates were captured and in jail. When Mendoza wrote to the King, 10th September, that the conspiracy had been discovered, he says that out of the six men who had sworn to kill the Queen, and whose names had never previously been mentioned, 'only two have escaped, namely, the favourite Raleigh, and the brother of Lord Windsor.' At the first sight it appears absolutely impossible that Raleigh can have been associated with the conspirators to kill the Queen, unless it were as a spy ; but there are some curious unexplained circumstances in connection with the matter, which—like the allegation itself—have not hitherto been noticed. Morgan, the Queen of Scotland's agent in Paris, wrote to her in April 1585, saying that he had made friends with several of the English gentlemen who had come over to Paris with Lord Derby, and had since continued in secret communication with them, whereby he hoped to have drawn some secret service for her Majesty (Mary Stuart); but in the midst of his negotiations he had been lodged in the Bastile, and his purpose had been disappointed. 'Amongst those that I mean was one named William Langharne, secretary to Master Rawley the Quene's dere minion who daylye groweth in credit. The said secretary is a good Catholic, and his master and Her Majestie's new hoste Poulett are friends, which moved me the more willingly to take hold of his proffered amity.' It is true that this mysterious action of Raleigh's secretary does not in any way compromise his master; but it is certain that the latter was playing a double game at the time, whatever his object may have been. In 1586, a ship belonging to him had captured at sea a Portuguese vessel, on board of which was Don Pedro Sarmiento de Gamboa, King Philip's governor of the Spanish settlements in Patagonia. He was an important person, and a famous navigator, and in the ordinary course would have been held to heavy ransom. The English merchants just then were crying out about the ruin brought to their commerce by the state of war with Spain, and it suited Elizabeth to sound Philip about the conclusion of a peaceable arrangement. It was therefore settled that Sarmiento should be released by

Raleigh without ransom, and proceed to Spain with offers for peace. He had more than one interview with the Queen, Cecil, and Raleigh, who entrusted him with pacific messages for the King. Sarmiento told Mendoza that he had had many private conversations with Raleigh; 'and signified to him how wise it would be for him to offer his services to Your Majesty, as the Queen's favour to him could not last long. He said that if he (Raleigh) would attend sincerely to Your Majesty's interests in England, apart from the direct reward he would receive, Your Majesty's support when occasion arose might prevent him from falling. Raleigh accepted the advice, and asked Sarmiento to inform Your Majesty of his willingness, if Your Majesty would accept his services, to oppose Don Antonio's attempts, and to prevent the sailing of expeditions from England. He would, moreover, send a large ship of his own heavily armed to Lisbon, and sell it for Your Majesty's service for the sum of 5000 crowns. In order that he might learn whether Your Majesty would accept his services, he gave Sarmiento a countersign, and wrote to a nephew of his here (in Paris) learning the language, telling him, that the moment I gave him a letter from Sarmiento he was to start with it to England.' Sarmiento was captured by Huguenots on his way through the south of France, and held as a prisoner. Both Elizabeth and Philip were indignant, and made great efforts to procure his release. As soon as Mendoza learned of Sarmiento's capture, he sent word to Raleigh's nephew, who volunteered to start for England at once and inform his uncle. The latter immediately dispatched two of his followers to France to beg Henry of Navarre, in the name of the Queen, to release Sarmiento. They were first to address themselves to Mendoza, who lent them 100 crowns for their expenses on Raleigh's account. On the 18th February 1587, Mendoza writes to Philip:—'I am assured that he (Raleigh) is very cold about these naval preparations (i.e., in England), and is trying secretly to dissuade the Queen from them. He is much more desirous of sending to Spain his own two ships for sale, than to use them for robbery. To confirm him in his good tendency I came to the help of the two gentlemen he sent hither, who asked me for some money. . . . This will give him hopes that Your Majesty will accept his services, and will cause him to continue to oppose Don Antonio (i.e., the Portuguese pretender), who is upheld by the Earl of Leicester.' In response to this, Philip ordered his ambassador to assure Raleigh that 'his aid would be highly esteemed, and adequately rewarded.' But Philip was somewhat suspicious, for in his next letter he says:—'As for his (Raleigh) sending for sale the two ships he mentions, that is out of the question, in the first place to avoid his being looked upon with suspicion in his own country, in consequence of his being well-treated (here), whilst all his countrymen are persecuted; and secondly to guard ourselves against the coming of the ships under this pretext being a feint or trick upon us—which is far from being improbable—but you need only mention the first reason to him.’

All this may have been perfectly innocent, or more likely, intended to mislead the Spaniards, but it certainly establishes the fact that communications between them and Raleigh were taking place at that time. And yet in March 1586, when, according to Mendoza, he was one of the six men privy to the intention to kill the Queen, he writes thus to the Earl of Leicester, then in Holland as the Queen’s governor, who had asked him to send over some English pioneers. He assures the earl of his desire ‘to performe all offices of love, honour, and service towards you.’ ‘But I have byn of late very pestilent reported to be rather a drawer back than a fartherer of the action where you govern. Your Lordship doth well understand my affection towards Spayn, and how I have consumed the best part of my fortune, hating the tyrannous prosperity of that State; and it were now strang and monsterous that I should becum an enemy of my countrey and conscience.’ Yet, only a few months afterwards, he was ostensibly offering his humble services to Philip to hamper English armaments against him, and wishing to sell his two armed ships to be used against his own country.

However this may be, no sooner was the wretched Babington condemned, than he founded all his hope of pardon upon Raleigh's action in his favour, and directed his cousin to offer the favourite £1000 for his life. 'Show this note,' he says, 'to young Master Lovelace, and bid him tell Master Flower that, in respect of the service I can do Her Majesty, I desire to speak with his master' (i.e. Raleigh). It is fair to say, however, that there is no other known evidence to connect Raleigh with Babington, except the before-quoted assertion of the Spanish ambassador. By Babington's death the favourite's wealth was very largely increased. His own younger son's estate in Devonshire was a small one indeed—only the poor manor of Collaton Raleigh — and his Irish estates produced but little. But now the Queen granted to him nearly every acre of the broad lands in five English counties possessed by the unfortunate Babington, together with all his goods and property of every sort, with the sole exception of a curious clock which Her Majesty kept for herself.

This may be considered as the highest point of Raleigh's power and splendour ; but already a younger rival was in the field, who, by-and-by, was to deprive him of much of the sovereign's personal regard for him. When in 1587 Mendoza had told his master that the reason why Raleigh was opposed to the plans of the Portuguese pretender, Don Antonio, was because the Earl of Leicester favoured them, he was somewhat behind the times. Leicester's influence over the Queen had greatly decreased; and, in fact, he never was a strong supporter of Don Antonio, except when he could get some advantage for himself. The real backer of Don Antonio was Leicester's turbulent young step-son, the Earl of Essex, and it is far more probable that Raleigh's approaches to the Spanish interests were prompted by a desire to check the efforts of the rising favourite. Essex was only twenty years old at the time, and this is what a courtier writes of his relations with the Queen, who was over fifty. 'When she is abroad nobody is near her but my Lord of Essex; and at night my Lord is at cards, or one game or another with her, till the birds sing in the morning.' But great as was the favour shown to him, Essex, it was gall to him if 'that knave Raleigh,' as he called him, shared with him the good graces of the Queen.

On one occasion (1587) Essex thought the Queen had slighted him to please Raleigh; 'for whose sake I saw she would both grieve me and my love, and disgrace me in the eye of the world. From thence she came to speak of Raleigh, and it seemed she could not well endure anything to be spoken against him; and taking hold of one word "disdain," she said there was no such cause why I should disdain him. This speech troubled me so much that, as near as I could, I did describe unto her what he had been and what he was.'

The insolent young noble little thought, probably,

that his elder rival was not only a fortunate favourite, and the Queen's platonic lover, but a great genius, whose knowledge was already encyclopedic, and whose busy brain was teeming with far-reaching plans for giving England a noble share in the new found lands beyond the sea.

For the present we have done with him in the enervating surroundings of the Court of the virgin Queen, and will now consider him in his capacity of a prime builder of the empire.

CHAPTER IV

SIR HUMPHREY GILBERT AND THE COLONISATION OF NORTH AMERICA—RALEGH'S PATENT FOR THE PLANTING OF VIRGINIA—THE FIRST VOYAGE
THITHER—THE SETTLEMENT AT WOKOKEN

THE age was a prodigal and lavish one. The wondrous tales of the gold brought from the Indies by the Spaniards had fired the greed of the English mariners, who were fully conscious now that they and their ships were more than a match for any others that sailed the sea. They exulted in the knowledge, and flinched from no opportunity of proving their metal. The Spaniards had found their way by the Straits of Magellan into the Southern Sea; the dream of English mariners was to discover a better and nearer road still to Cathay by the north-west, and perhaps find gold on the way. The Cabots, Master Hore, and Sir Hugh Willoughby and others, long before, had essayed it and had failed, but all undismayed the Elizabethan sailors pursued the same phantom. In 1576 Martin Frobisher thought he had succeeded when he slowly groped his way into Hudson's Bay. He had only two tiny craft of 35 tons each, and had no thought yet of colonisation, but merely of opening up a new way to the teeming East for trade. By chance a shining piece of pyritic ore glittering with metal was picked up on the shore, and brought to England. It was falsely reported to be rich in gold, and the next year Frobisher went again and brought home three cargoes of the stuff. Gilbert himself wrote a treatise, which was published without his consent in 1576, demonstrating the probability of a passage being discovered that way to China. We have seen how his and Raleigh's attempt to establish an English settlement on the North American coast in 1578 had been frustrated, but Gilbert was ever on the alert, and in the meantime had not been idle. The pilot, Simon Fernandez, had, with Walsingham's help, been sent to the coast of America, and had brought back glowing accounts of the fertility of the land. In the year 1583 David Ingram of Barking, mariner, allowed his imagination full play in describing the banqueting houses of crystal, with pillars of gold and silver, to be found there, and Captain Walker reported the discovery of a silver mine within the mystic River Norumbega. In all these attempts, the discovery of the north-west passage was the first object, the finding of gold the second, and only in Gilbert's case was colonisation aimed at.

But in the meanwhile Gilbert's six years' patent was running out, and it was necessary for him to make a serious attempt to effect its object. Drake's triumphant return from his voyage round the world in the autumn of 1580 had given an immense impetus to the fitting out of expeditions for plunder and discovery in all directions, but still with no view to permanent settlements. With Raleigh's sudden rise at Court in 1582 came his step-brother's opportunity. The latter had been nearly ruined, 'forced,' as he wrote to Walsingham, 'to sell his wife's clothes from her back,' in consequence of his three ships having been pressed for the Queen's service in Ireland during the rebellion, whereby he lost £2000, his ships having been stolen and carried away in his absence. This was written in July 1581; but by June 1582 all had changed. Raleigh was then at the Queen's ear and could do most things; and his own means were spent without stint on the object he had nearest his heart, namely, English maritime and colonial enterprise. The revived project of the expedition was a patriotic one in two senses. There was a considerable number of Catholic gentlemen in England who were heartily tired of the continual contest with their fellow-countrymen which their religion forced upon them. They had no desire to become the tools of Spanish ambition. They desired to remain Englishmen and yet to retain the exercise of their faith. These 'Schismatics,' as they were called by the Jesuits and the extreme Catholics, were approached by Walsingham with a suggestion that, if they would provide money for the expedition, colonies of English Catholics could be planted on the American coast, where they would remain under the English flag, but at liberty to govern their own lives as they pleased. The Spanish party were horrified at the idea, which they said had been invented by Walsingham for the purpose of splitting and weakening the Catholic party in the country. This may well have been the case, though we can afford now to give him credit for higher and more patriotic motives. In June 1582, accordingly, two moderate Catholic gentlemen, Sir George Gerrard and Sir Thomas Peckham, received power from Gilbert in virtue of his patent, 'to discover all lands and isles upon that part of America between Cape Florida and Cape Breton. Any two out of four islands discovered by them, or by Gilbert for them, were to be held by them and their heirs for ever, together with 1,500,000 acres of land on the "supposed adjoining continent," paying a small chief-rent to Gilbert, together with two-fifths of all gold and silver, pearls or precious stones found.' A further agreement of the same date set forth, 'that for the more speedy executing of Her Majesty's grant, and the enlargement of her dominions,' Sir Thomas Peckham is to be entitled to take possession of a further 500,000 acres on the continent.

Shortly before this date the Spanish ambassador had got wind of the project—for he had his spies everywhere reporting upon the movements of English ships—and wrote to his King that, ‘when the Queen was petitioned to aid in the expedition, Gilbert was told that he was to go, and when he had landed and fortified the place, the Queen would send him 10,000 men to hold it.’

By the middle of July the matter was settled. The lands were to be held under the crown of England in fee simple. One soldier was to be maintained by the colonists for every 5000 acres occupied, and the best places were to be reserved for building towns, ‘with sufficient ground for their commons of pasture rent free, and also some small portion, not exceeding 10 acres, to be allowed for every house built, for the better maintenance of the poor inhabitants, reserving some small rents for the same. All the colonists were to be sent over at the cost of the realm, and each person was to receive a grant of 60 acres of land for three lives, besides common for so much cattle in the summer as they can keep in the winter, with such allowance for housebote, hedgebote and ploughbote as the country may serve.’ There were minute conditions for manuring the lands, for the payment of fines and heriots, all of which feudal paraphernalia reads quaintly and curiously, as applying to the boundless continent of America. Every poor colonist was to take over so much food, and picks, spades, saws, etc., for the cost of all of which the colony was to pay the mother country every third year—‘which can be no loss to England.’

Every person who paid his own passage, and brought with him a sword and harquebuss, was to have six score acres of land, and every gentleman with five followers was to receive a grant of 2000 acres in fee simple, and every adventurer of £5, 1000 acres. Each parish was to consist of exactly 3 miles square, with the church in the midst, the minister to have his tithes, and 300 acres of land free, each bishop 10,000 acres, and each archbishop 20,000 acres. It will thus be seen that the project was a large one; the intention being really to plant a great England in North America. The Spaniards fully understood it in this light. Mendoza wrote to his master on the day following the signing of the agreement, from which the above particulars are extracted (8th July 1582):—‘As I wrote some time ago, Humphrey Gilbert is fitting out ships to gain a footing in Florida, and in order to make this not only prejudicial to Your Majesty’s interests, but injurious to Catholics here, whilst benefiting the heretics, Walsingham approached two Catholic gentlemen, whose estate had been ruined, and intimated to them that, if they would help Humphrey

Gilbert in the voyage, their lives and liberties might be saved, and the Queen might . . . allow them to settle there in the enjoyment of freedom of conscience, and of their property in England, for which purpose they might avail themselves of the intercession of Philip Sidney. As they were desirous of living as Catholics, without endangering their lives, they thought the proposal a good one. They with other Catholics have petitioned the Queen, and she has granted them a patent . . . to colonise Florida, on the banks of the Norumbega, where they are to be allowed to live as their conscience dictates, and to enjoy such revenues as they possess in England.' The writer then gives an account of the efforts he has made to dissuade the Catholics from the project. He tells them it is only a trick to destroy them, that the country in question belonged to Spain, and they would all be murdered, as Ribaut was, that they were acting against the interests of His Holiness, whose leave should first be asked. Father Allen, at Rome, was warned also to induce the Pope to ban the expedition. But still the project went on, and in the summer two ships were sent to reconnoitre the sites of the intended settlements.

By December 1582, a great company of adventurers was formed to trade with the new colony, most of the principal people in England having shares in it, including all those—Raleigh amongst them—who had been partners in Gilbert's former abortive attempt. For the purpose of taking part in the expedition, of which he was to be Vice-Admiral, Raleigh decided to put into practice some of his advanced theories with regard to naval construction, and built a ship of 200 tons, which he called the Bark-Raleigh. The exact construction of this vessel is not known, but it has been usual to confuse her with the much larger vessel called the Ark-Raleigh, built by Raleigh in 1587, and employed in the Armada. The larger ship, the Ark-Raleigh, was looked upon as a sort of wonder; and Lord Admiral Howard, who had hoisted his pennant on it, calls it the oddest ship in the world, and the best for all conditions.

At length, in the spring of 1583, all was ready for sailing. The Queen had vetoed the going of Raleigh himself; and mindful of Gilbert's former misfortune, endeavoured to restrain him also. He had started first in February, but was driven back and kept at Southampton, and she, or Walsingham for her, sent him word that she wished him to stay at home, 'as a man noted for no good hap at sea.' But he pleaded hard to be allowed to go. He had spent, he said, all his means on the enterprise, had sold his lands, and risked everything. His unfortunate return on the last occasion was only because he would not do, or allow others to do, anything against the Queen's command. The Queen was appeased, and ordered Raleigh to send to Sir Humphrey a token and the following letter :—

‘RICHMONDE, 17th March 1583.

‘BROTHER,—I have sent you a token from Her Majestie, an anchor guided by a lady as you see ; and farther, Her Highness willed me to sende you worde that she wished you as great good hap, and safty to your ship, as if her sealf were ther in person : desiring you to have care of your sealf, as of that which she tendereth ; and therefore for her sake you must provide for it accordingly.

‘Further, she commandeth me that you leve your picture with me. For the rest I leve till our meeting, or to the report of this bearer, who would needs be messengre of this good newse. So I committ you to the will and protection of God, Who send us such life or death as He shall please, or hath appointed. Your treu brother,

W. RALEGH.’

It was the 11th June before the expedition sailed. The Bark-Raleigh of 200 tons was much the largest of the ships ; but they had hardly got out of the Channel when she deserted them and came back. It was said that a contagious disease had broken out on board, but evidently Sir Humphrey did not believe, or was unaware of it, for he wrote angrily to Sir George Peckham, that she had run from him in fair clear weather, having a large wind. ‘I pray you solicit my brother Raleigh to make them an example to all knaves.' With the other four little ships Sir Humphrey sailed west until he reached the coast of Newfoundland. This was not the place it was intended to colonise, but as he was there he took possession of it for the English crown by the quaint ceremony of cutting a sod and accepting a hazel wand. There were thirty or forty fishing boats of various nationalities off the coast, and Gilbert invited the captains on shore to witness the ceremony. Many of them came, and offered no protest. They were peaceful folk, and it was perhaps wise that they did not. The Queen's arms were set up on the shore, and nominal grants of territory were given to the members of the expedition. But they were a lawless lot, and whilst Gilbert was on shore, his crews tried to desert with his ships, failing in which they robbed the fishing boats. Many fell sick and had to be sent home in the Swallow; many more died, and the commander, with his remaining three ships, was glad to sail for the more hospitable south, where the new colony was to be founded. They left St John's on the 20th August, and were driven backwards and forwards on the tempestuous North Atlantic until the 20th, when the Delight ran on a bank and was wrecked. The other two vessels, the Golden Hinde, and a tiny cockboat of 10 tons burden called the Squirrel, overladen, crowded with sick, beset by perils, still battled against head winds. Terrible marine monsters were seen; shoals, storms, and fog took hope and spirit from the men, who prayed Gilbert to abandon the voyage, and set his course to England. When they had arrived at a point north of the Azores, still in fearful weather, it became apparent that the Squirrel could not live through the sea. The men on the Golden Hinde besought Gilbert to leave the crazy, overloaded boat and go on board the larger vessel, but he resolutely refused. 'I will not,' he said, 'forsake my little company with whom I have passed through so many perils.' Those on the Golden Hinde saw him calmly, with a book in his hand, sitting in the stern of his doomed craft, and as the ships on one occasion came within hailing distance, he cried out to them, { Be of good heart, my friends. We are as near to Heaven by sea as by land.' } A few hours afterwards, on the night of the 9th September, the light of the Squirrel was suddenly quenched, and brave Sir Humphrey and his little company were seen no more. He had faced death on the seas a hundred times before, and could look upon it undismayed, as such a hero should. He had risked all he had in the venture, and probably courted death rather than return home with the indelible brand upon him of 'a man of no good hap at sea.'

The Golden Hinde found her way into Falmouth on the 22d September, with the dismal news that Gilbert's second attempt to colonise North America for England had failed more disastrously than the first. The great dream of the Gilberts, like that of Cabot, Willoughby, Frobisher, Davis, and most English seamen of the time, was the discovery of a north-west passage to China; and to this task the younger of the brothers, Adrian Gilbert, succeeded Sir Humphrey, always with the support and help of Raleigh. But the genius of the latter enabled him to foresee the importance of the still greater work—that of founding an English nation across the sea, as he himself expressed it—and to this idea through evil fortune, and through good, he was true to the rest of his life—even to martyrdom.

➤ On the 24th March 1584, fresh letters-patent were granted, giving to Sir Walter Raleigh, Esq., and his heirs 'free liberty to discover barbarous countries, not actually possessed of any Christian prince and inhabited by Christian people, to occupy and enjoy the same for ever.' The country was to be held by homage to the Sovereign of England, who was to receive the fifth part of all precious metals found. The inhabitants were to 'enjoy all the privileges of free denizens of England,' and Raleigh or his representatives were to have power 'to punish, pardon, govern and rule'; the laws to be 'as near as may be agreeable to the laws of England.' Exactly a month after this (on the 27th April 1584) Raleigh dispatched two of his captains, Philip Amadas and Arthur Barlow, under the guidance of the pilot Simon Fernandez, on a reconnoitring voyage to the proposed settlement, which had previously been fixed upon five years before by Fernandez. They wrongly calculated that the current from the Gulf of Mexico would have carried them greatly in a northerly direction, and accordingly set their course far to the south of the point they desired to gain. Touching the Canaries on the 10th May, they reached the West Indies on the 10th June. They then stretched across to the mainland of Florida, which they reached on the 4th July, and thence groped up the coast to the point previously selected by Fernandez, arriving there on the 13th July. In the report furnished by the captains to Raleigh, they describe how they entered the harbour, three harquebuss shots' distance inland, and then landed and took possession for the Queen of England. Grapes in marvellous abundance grew down to the water's edge ; magnificent cedars and other trees abounded, and the soil appeared to them to be of wonderful fertility. On further search, they found the land to be an island, 20 miles long, and about 6 broad, running parallel with the continent, forming part of a chain of similar islands, extending for a distance of 200 miles along the coast. The natives they found unsuspecting of all harm, peaceful, conciliatory and mild. The brother of the King of the country which they called Wingandecoia—the name of the island being Wokeken—came to them with a band of natives who soon became extremely friendly. Skins, coral and pearls were brought freely in exchange for the wonderful treasures of the white man. The King's brother was especially enamoured of a tin dish which he obtained and suspended from his neck as a defence against the darts of enemies. 'He had,' says the captains, 'a great liking for our armour, a sword, and divers other things which we had, and offered to lay a great box of pearls in gage for them. But we refused it for this time, because we would not make them know we esteemed thereof, until we had understood in what places of the country the pearls grew.' A glowing picture is given of the luxuriance of the vegetation. Two crops of corn were gathered in the year, and food, especially fruit, was so abundant, that the narrators are obliged to confess that surely this was the best soil under heaven. The elaborate conditions in the original patent as to the proper periodical manuring of the land must have struck the discoverers as strangely unnecessary, now that, for the first time, their eyes rested upon the teeming virgin soil of the West. They heard of a great city five days' journey away, called Sicoak, and themselves visited the next island of the chain, that of Roanoak; and then, bringing away with them two of the mild natives, Manteo and Wanchese, they sailed to take the news to Raleigh of the fertile country of which he in future was to be the lord. The booty they brought with them was not magnificent, consisting as it did only of skins and a bracelet of pearls, 'as big as peasen,' but it doubtless satisfied Raleigh. What he wanted was a firm foothold for his countrymen on the northern continent of America, which should balance the overweening power of the Spaniards in the South. In after years, it became necessary for him to hold out the bait of gold, in order to attract adventurers to aid his expeditions with funds, but it was never his own prime object, much as he loved the splendour for which it would pay.

The misfortune of the Spanish dominion in the Indies had always been that the main object of the explorers had been gold. Their first question on landing had been as to its presence and whereabouts; and the heartrending cruelties perpetrated upon inoffensive natives to extort the disclosure of their supposed treasures had shocked the more humane of the Spaniards themselves. The capture and sacking of Quito and Cuzco with their countless hoards of gold and gems, the pillage of the Incas with wealth beyond conception, had inflamed the greed of the world; and the bait which had drawn the earlier English navigators to the West had been a share, either by discovery or plunder, of the golden stream which seemed inexhaustible.

It is to the lasting glory of Raleigh that his clear prescience pierced beyond the momentary advantage of easily gained mineral wealth. He and his brother Sir Humphrey Gilbert, indeed, were the forerunners of the school of thought which has now grown predominant, namely, that gold itself is only one instrument of commerce, not a substitute for it.

Gilbert in his treatise on the existence of a north-west passage, which was published without authority by Raleigh's friend Gascoigne, and shows unmistakable signs of Raleigh's own hand, points out the advantage of planting settlements in suitable situations under English rule, as a means of extending and enriching commerce, and of furnishing employment 'to those needy people who trouble the commonwealth through want at home.' Captain Carlile, who was a follower of Raleigh, and Thomas Hariot, the famous mathematician, who was employed by him to report upon the natural productions and commercial capabilities of Virginia, both enforced the principles, then novel, which had been conceived by the master mind, namely, that colonisation, trade, and the enlargement of empire were all more important for the welfare of England than the discovery of gold. Purchas publishes an anonymous treatise written during Raleigh's life—at the beginning of the seventeenth century—which shows how quickly his ideas had taken hold of the more thinking minds of his countrymen. The sound views of political economy expressed therein were practically undreamt of before Raleigh's time. 'The very name of colony,' says the author, 'imports a reasonable and seasonable culture and planting, before a harvest or vintage can be expected. Though gold and silver have enriched the Spanish exchequer, yet their storehouses hold other and greater wealth, whereof Virginia is no less capable, namely, the country's commodities. What mines have they in Brazil and in the islands where yet so many wealthy Spaniards and Portuguese inhabit? Their ginger, hides, tobacco, and other merchandise, it may be boldly affirmed, yield far more profit to the generality of the Spanish subjects than the mines do, or have done this last age. Who gave gold and silver the monopoly of wealth, or made them the Almighty's favourites? That is the richest land which feeds most men. What remarkable mines hath France, Belgium, Lombardy? What this our fertile mother England? Do we not see that the silks, calicoes, drugs and spices of the East swallow up all the mines of the West?'

These or similar ideas were those which animated Raleigh in his first attempts to establish an 'English nation' on the other side of the Atlantic, and they have been justified by the added experience of three centuries.

The two captains returned to England in September 1584 with their glowing report of the new land they had visited, and with the natives they had brought. Raleigh submitted the information to the Queen, who herself dubbed the new dominion Virginia, and then the favourite set about his colonising plans in earnest. He was chosen one of the members of parliament for Devonshire at the end of the year; and early in 1585 obtained a parliamentary confirmation of his colonising patent. But the Spaniards were watching him with jealous eyes. Drake was fitting out his expedition to the West Indies to sack and plunder; Raleigh being one of the shareholders. Under his auspices, and those of Adrian Gilbert, Davis was preparing for another attempt to discover the north-west passage, and English rovers were busier than ever lying in wait for the rich Spanish galleons. The Spanish ambassador had been expelled from England, and a state of war existed between the two countries; but Mendoza, in Paris, had his spies in every English port, and ceaselessly sent to his master minute accounts of the movements of English shipping. On the 22d February 1585, he writes:—‘The Queen has knighted Raleigh, her favourite, and has given him a ship of her own of 180 tons burden, with five pieces of artillery on each side, and two culverins in the bows. Raleigh has also bought two Dutch fly-boats of 120 tons each to carry stores, and two other boats of 40 tons, in addition to which he is having built four pinnaces of 20 to 30 tons each. Altogether Raleigh will fit out no fewer than 16 vessels, in which he intends to convey 400 men. The Queen has assured him that if he will refrain from going himself she will defray all the expenses of the preparations. Raleigh’s fleet will be ready to sail for Norumbega at the beginning of next month.’ How disturbed the Spaniards were at all these preparations is seen in a letter from Hakluyt, in Paris, to Walsingham on the 7th April. ‘The rumour of Sir Walter Rawley’s fleet, and especially the preparations of Sir Francis Drake, doth so much vex the Spaniard and his factors, as nothing can be more, and therefore I could wish that although Sir Francis Drake's journey be stayed, yet the rumour of his setting forth might continue.' They had reason to be vexed, for the English 'corsairs' were growing ever bolder, and a few weeks after this was written, a ship called the Primrose entered the river at Bilbao, kidnapped the Lieutenant-Governor of Biscay, and a number of his countrymen, and coolly brought them to England for ransom.

Unfortunately the Queen's affection for Raleigh prevented him from personally accompanying his colonial expedition, which was accordingly entrusted to the command of his cousin Sir Richard Grenville. Like most of the men of his stamp and period, he was brave and magnanimous to a fault, but overbearing, proud, and tyrannical. Fight and plunder were what he gloried in, and the far-reaching ideas of his statesman-cousin with regard to the extension of commerce and empire probably appealed to him but little. In any case, he exhibited no tact in carrying them out.

The expedition sailed from Plymouth on the 9th April 1585, and consisted of a smaller number of vessels than that reported by the Spanish ambassador. There was the Tyger of 140 tons, the Roebuck of 140, the Lyon of 100, the Elizabeth of 50, the Dorothy and two other small pinnaces, seven sail in all ; and besides Grenville there were Ralph Lane, one of the Queen's equerries, who was to be the governor of the new colony, Captain Amadas, Thomas Cavendish, John Arundell, Stukeley, Hariot, the Indian Manteo, and over a hundred colonists. They, too, went a very roundabout course, arriving at Lanzarote on the 14th April, at Dominica on the 7th May, and on the 12th landed in Mosquito Bay, Porto Rico, where they entrenched themselves and set about building a new pinnacle. This was decidedly against instructions, as they were not to assail the dominions of any Christian prince, and the Spaniards were unquestionably in possession of the island. After some days of spying upon the intruders, the Spanish officials came with a flag of truce and mildly expostulated with Grenville for erecting a fortification on their territory. With some discussion they were reassured, and they promised a supply of provisions, which for some reason—Grenville calls it their 'habitual perjury'—they delayed or neglected to bring ; 'so we fired the woods all about,' and sailed away on the 29th. On the 1st June the expedition anchored in the Bay of Isabela, in the island of Hispaniola, after capturing an unoffending Spanish frigate. They found the Spanish governor extremely hospitable and friendly, which attitude they rather ungenerously ascribed to his fear of their superior forces. In any case, his friendship for the English must soon have received a rude shock when

Drake, a few months afterwards, sacked and plundered the chief town of the island. On the 7th June they took their departure, and sailing along the Bahamas, sighted the mainland of what was then called Florida, but is now the State of South Carolina, somewhere north of the site of the present Charleston, on the 20th June. They were nearly wrecked off Cape Fear three days afterwards, and on the 26th reached their destination, the island of Wokoken. The entrance they made use of seems to have been the Okeracoke Inlet, and in this entrance they nearly wrecked the Tyger, one of their principal ships, on the 29th, by the fault, according to Grenville, of the pilot Fernandez. They lost no time in sending news of their arrival to the friendly chief Wingina on the larger island of Roanoak; and on the 11th July Grenville, Arundell, Stukeley, Hariot, Governor Lane, and Assistant-Governor Amadas, victualled for eight days, set forth to effect a landing on the continent of North America. They heard rumours of great towns and powerful peoples, all more or less vague, but from the petty chiefs they met they experienced nothing but kindness and hospitality. On their expedition one of the savages stole a silver cup, and a boat was sent ashore to demand the restitution, which was promised by the chief. The promise apparently was not kept, and the whole town was consequently 'burned and spoyled' in revenge, the first of a series of feuds, which changed the kindly aborigines into stealthy, cruel enemies of the white men. The furthest point north reached by the expedition on this occasion appears to have been Cape Hatteras ; and on the 27th July they again arrived at the site of the future settlement, on the island of Wokoken. Houses having been erected, and stores of all sorts landed, the first colony of England in the west was formerly inaugurated, with Ralph Lane as governor, and 107 settlers ; and Sir Richard Grenville sailed away for England on the 25th August. Governor Lane reported to Walsingham that Grenville had from the first exhibited intolerable pride and ambition towards the entire company, and they were probably not very sorry to see the back of him. He had left the colonists sufficient supplies to last them for a year, but faithfully promised to return before the following Easter with fresh provisions. Six days after leaving the settlement Grenville fell in with a Spanish ship, richly laden, of 300 tons burden. He had no proper ship's boat, but was determined not to be baulked of so tempting a prize as this, so he and his men shifted to board her in a boat made of sides of provision chests, which with difficulty could be kept afloat until it was brought alongside the Spanish ship. The moment they boarded the prize their boat went down, but the poor Spaniards made no resistance and were meekly carried to England by their captors, arriving in Plymouth Sound on the 18th October. On board the prize the principal treasure was a fine cabinet of pearls; and much wrangling ensued between the captors as to their respective shares of the booty. Sir Lewis Stukeley, who was afterwards Raleigh's jailer and betrayer, said that Raleigh had charged Elizabeth with taking all the pearls for herself, 'without so much as even giving him one pearl'; which, indeed, was an extremely likely thing for her to do, though it was unlike Raleigh to talk about it. Amongst the men who had been pressed in Plymouth to accompany the expedition was a German shipmaster, who, much against his will, accompanied Grenville through the voyage. It was not easy for him to get away from England when he came back, but eventually he managed to find his way to Spain, and gave Philip a long account in Latin of the whole voyage. This was sent to Philip's ambassador in Paris, and in reference thereto the ambassador sent his master some further interesting particulars. He says, 'The ship which this captain says was captured by Raleigh's expedition, with so large a treasure in gold, silver, pearls, cochineal, sugar, ivory and hides was the one I advised Your Majesty of months ago as having arrived in England, and that Raleigh himself had gone down to the port to take possession of her cargo, so as not to allow it to be distributed amongst the sailors.' The Queen had granted 70 fresh letters of marque in reprisal for the embargo placed on English ships in Biscay ports, and the sea positively swarmed with privateers. Philip and his officers were in despair, for the command of the sea was even now slipping away from him. The friendly treatment which Raleigh's expedition had encountered at Porto Rico and Hispaniola was reported to the King by the German captain, and excited great indignation against the officials. Spanish settlers were accused even of making signal fires at night to give notice to the English privateers that they were willing to exchange food for merchandise—merchandise which had mostly been stolen from outward bound Spaniards. Matters had reached such a pass, indeed, that it is difficult to blame the settlers. Philip had prohibited all traffic with the Indies except by means of Spanish ships sailing from Seville. These ships regularly took the same course, by the Azores, where they were just as regularly captured by the crowds of corsairs that awaited them; and storm and punish as Philip and his officers might, it often happened that the only means the Spanish settlers had of obtaining European commodities at all was through the English privateers.

CHAPTER V

THE SETTLEMENT OF VIRGINIA — TOBACCO — THE SECOND COLONY OF VIRGINIA—THE ARMADA
—ABANDONMENT OF THE VIRGINIAN SETTLERS

MOST of the misfortunes which befell Raleigh's attempt to settle his new dominion arose from the fact that his duties near the Queen prevented him from giving it the benefit of his personal supervision. His power, prestige, knowledge of men and enthusiasm would probably have saved the colonists from the insubordination and folly which led to their failure. Lane manfully did his best, and sent home by Grenville glowing accounts of the country. To Walsingham (12th August 1585) he wrote that they had 'discovered so many rare and singular commodities in Her Majesty's new kingdom of Virginia, that no state in Christendom do yield better or more plentiful, and the ship's freight we are sending will prove I do not lie.' He says that they have named the three ports, Trinity, Scarborough and Ocana, where the fleet stuck, and the Tyger was nearly lost. The best port, which was discovered by the pilot-major Simon Fernandez, would, he says, be able to resist the whole force of Spain. He continues,—‘We have undertaken to remain with a good company, rather to lose our lives than to defer the possession of so noble a kingdom to the Queen, our country and our noble patron Sir Walter Raleigh, through whose and your worship’s (Walsingham’s) most worthy endeavour and infinite charge, an honourable entry is made to the conquest. . . . I am assured that we will by this means be relieved of the tyranny of the Spaniards, and that the Papists will not be suffered by God to triumph. . . . God will command even the ravens to feed us.’

But after Grenville’s departure affairs grew less promising, and Lane’s position became more difficult. Quarrels soon broke out amongst the settlers themselves, and between them and the Indians, whom the first visitors had described as ‘the most gentle, loving and faithful, void of all guile and treason, and such as live after the manner of the golden age.’ It is impossible to say now on which side the fault lay, but differences arose between the settlers and the Indians almost as soon as Grenville sailed away. The settlers ploughed, planted and sowed; explored for pearl fisheries and mines; and Hariot especially was indefatigable in obtaining knowledge of the natural products of the country. He it was who first tried the native habit of smoking tobacco, and enjoyed it;

the food value of the potato also appealed strongly to his practical wisdom, and he urged the experiment of its cultivation in England. The governor explored and took possession of the coast for a distance of 80 miles south of Roanoak and 130 to the north, as far as the Chesapeake. In the spring the King's brother Granganimeo, the friend of the English, died. Lane in his subsequent apology alleges that the King, Wingina, then under another name, plotted an insurrection against the English, for which he and his friends were put to death, another chief called Okisa doing homage to the Queen of England in his stead.

Grenville had promised to return by Easter, but he came not, and the colonists lost heart. The provisions were well nigh exhausted, although the corn was almost ready for cutting, when, on the 10th June 1586, a large fleet of ships appeared on the coast. This could not be Grenville, they knew, for he would not come in so strong a force. Their anxiety was soon relieved by learning that the fleet was that of Sir Francis Drake, gorged with plunder from the sack of Cartagena and Santo Domingo. The admiral had bethought him to visit the new colony on his way home, and it may be imagined how the disheartened settlers would yearn with homesickness to desert their savage quarters, and sail in a powerful and prosperous fleet back again to their native land. At first they were appeased by the gift of fresh supplies, ammunition, and two boats, in which Lane promised them that they should all return to England in August, unless Grenville came in the meanwhile with re-inforcements. But as they were writing letters to their friends in England for Drake to carry home, a tempest sprang up and drove many of the ships out to sea ; amongst them the vessels with the provisions and pilots destined for the relief of the colonists, with many of the latter who were on board. In vain Sir Francis offered the rest of them another ship and supplies ; they insisted upon being taken on board the fleet and conveyed to England. Drake at last gave way, and the whole of the remaining colonists sailed for England on the 19th June.

Even before Grenville had arrived in England, Raleigh had ordered supplies to be prepared for the relief of his people in Virginia. Some slight delay had taken place in their departure, probably owing to the dispute about the division of the plunder from the prize. A swift vessel, of 100 tons burden, sailed, however, soon after Easter with all necessary stores for the colonists. It arrived at the deserted settlement almost immediately after Drake had sailed, and after unsuccessfully searching for the settlers, was forced to return to England with the stores intact. About a fortnight after she had left, Sir Richard Grenville himself, with the main relief and some fresh intended colonists, appeared at Port Ferdinando, as the settlers called their principal harbour. He, of course, was equally unsuccessful in his search for the colonists, and in his turn had to set sail for England, after leaving 15 new men on the island of Roanoak to continue the possession of the dominion.

On his way home Grenville, as usual, fell to plundering such Spanish ships as came in his way; and the voyage was not an unprofitable one to Raleigh, although the main object had failed. Raleigh, indeed, was quite largely engaged in the privateering business at the time. Most of the details of the voyages have, naturally, not been recorded; they were more or less business enterprises, and were looked upon in a very prosaic light. But by the industry of a certain John Evesham, gentleman, a musketeer on board of one of Raleigh's two pinnaces Serpent (35 tons) and Mary Spark (50 tons), we have in Hakluyt an interesting account of the proceedings of the two pinnaces during this summer of 1586. Sailing on the 10th June, they first captured a barque loaded with shumach, with the Governor of St Michael's on board; then when off the island of Graciosa they sighted a flotilla of homeward bound Spaniards to windward of them. Hoisting the Spanish flag, Raleigh's pinnaces gradually crept near their prey. When they came near enough, down went the false flag and up to the peak went the cross of St George. The first vessel they overhauled proved to be only a fisherman and not worth the keeping, so she was let go again; but the delay in taking her had given time for the other richly-loaded ships and a caravel to creep under the guns of Graciosa. The pinnaces were to leeward, and could not approach near enough to attack; and the Spaniards thought themselves safe for the time; but, says Evesham, we had a small boat called a lighthorseman in which a musketeer (myself) and four men with calivers and four rowers entered, and rowed towards them. The Spaniards were hurriedly attempting to land their precious cargoes, and there were 150 musketeers on the beach to protect them, but the gallant little 'lighthorseman,' with its five gunners, cut out the Spanish ships from under the very cannon of the fort, and towed the caravel and her cargo out to sea. Two more of the ships were then captured and manned by English sailors, all the Spaniards being released but those who were worth ransom, especially the already mentioned Sarmiento de Gamboa, Governor of Patagonia. These three rich prizes being sent home, there were left only 60 men on the pinnaces. Thus weakened, they fell in with two great carracks of 1200 tons burden, ten galleons, and as many caravels, loaded with treasure. Nothing daunted, the two tiny pinnaces engaged the whole fleet for thirty-two hours in succession, and finally sailed away—without capturing them it is true, but without the loss of a single man.

The deserting colonists from Virginia arrived at Plymouth in Drake's fleet at the end of July, and brought with them into England, probably for the first time, the habit of smoking tobacco, which Raleigh himself subsequently made fashionable at Court. The practice met with considerable opposition at first, and a proclamation was issued against it as the imitation of the manners of savage people. Camden says that it was feared that the English would degenerate thereby into barbarism.

The learned Hariot, however, was loud in his praises of the medical virtue of tobacco. The description he gives of the cultivation of the plant by the Indians is quaint. He says that they distinguished it by sowing it apart from all other vegetables, and held it of the highest estimation in all their sacrifices by fire, water and air; either for thanksgiving to, or pacification of, their gods. 'And as by sucking it through pipes of clay, they purged all gross humours from the head and stomach, opened all the pores and passages of the body, preserving it from obstructions or breaking them, whereby they notably preserved their health, and knew not many grievous diseases, wherewith we in England are often afflicted. So we ourselves during the time we were there used to suck it after their manner, as also since our return, and have found many rare and wonderful experiments of its virtues, whereof the relation would require a volume by itself; the use of which by so many men and women of great calling, as well as others, and some learned physicians also, is sufficient witness.' The 'learned physicians' and others would probably have cried up in vain the virtue of the plant, had not the splendid Raleigh made it fashionable amongst the fine Court gentleman, who envied, imitated and admired him.

Howell tells the story that Raleigh was descanting to the Queen upon the virtues of the new herb—the use of which had been strongly encouraged in France by her rival Queen Catherine de Medici—when he assured Her Majesty he had so well experienced the nature of it, that he could tell her what weight even the smoke would be in any quantity proposed to be consumed. ‘Her Majesty fixing her thoughts upon the most impracticable part of the experiment, that of bounding the smoke in a balance, suspected that he put the traveller upon her, and would needs lay him a wager that he could not solve the doubt : so he procured a quantity agreed upon, to be thoroughly smoked, then went to weighing, but it was of the ashes, and in conclusion what was wanting in the prime weight of the tobacco Her Majesty did not deny to have been evaporated in smoke, and further said that many labourers, in the fire she had heard of, who turned their gold into smoke, but Raleigh was the first who had turned smoke into gold.’

As is usually the case in similar enterprises, some of the returned colonists sought to cast the blame of their failure upon the qualities of the new country. Fortunately, however, there was at least one man amongst them of advanced, enlightened views and trained intelligence, who published a defence of it in a notable treatise published shortly afterwards. This was Thomas Hariot, who had been specially commissioned by Raleigh to report minutely upon the natural products and capabilities of the region, and his work is perhaps the first methodical statistical survey of a country ever published in English. He describes with great care the merchantable products of the country, and the best means for turning the possession to profit.*

‘Seeing the air there,’ he says, ‘is so temperate and wholesome, the soil so fertile, and yielding such commodities as I have before mentioned ; the voyage also to and fro sufficiently experienced to be performed twice a year with ease, and at any season ; and the dealings of Sir Walter Raleigh so liberal in giving and granting lands there, as is already known with many helps and furtherances else ; the least that he hath granted having been 500 acres to a man only for the adventure of his person, I hope there remains no cause whereby the action should be disliked.'

* It was published in 1588, and was called A Briefe and true report of the new found land of Virginia, of the commodities there found and to be rayseed, as well marchantable as others for victual, building and other necessarie use for those that are or shall be planters there ; and of the nature and manner of the naturall inhabitants discovered by the English Colony there seated by Sir Richard Grenville, Kt., in the yeere 1585, which remained under the government of Rafe Lane, Esq., one of Her Majestie’s equerries, during the space of 12 moneths. At the special charge of the Honble. Sir Walter Raleigh, Kt. ; directed to the adventurers, favourers and well-wishers of the action of inhabiting and planting there ; by Thomas Hariot, servant of the above-named Sir Walther, a member of the Colony, and there employed in the discoverie. London, 1588.

Doubtless the real reason for the discouragement of the colonists was the absence of gold in the new country. The ideas of Raleigh and Hariot were in advance of the times; the majority of the adventurers had no taste for permanent expatriation and the slow toil of agriculture in a new country. The idea of all such men was to grow suddenly rich by plunder or the discovery of gold, and to return home to spend their wealth; the colonisation of an agricultural country, indeed, was calculated to be of permanent benefit to the nation, but could hardly bring great or rapid riches to the persons who took part in it. Raleigh's perseverance in it at his own expense becomes in this light the more patriotic. He obtained, it is true, vast sums of money, but he spent them lavishly in what he conceived to be the public good. However this may have been ignored by the crowd, with whom Raleigh was always unpopular, it was recognised by the wiser heads of the time. Hooker, in his dedication to him of his Irish History, says, 'It is well known that it had been no less easy for you than for such as have been advanced by kings to have builded great houses, purchased great circuits, and to have used the fruits of princes' favours, as most men in all former and present ages have done, had you not preferred the general honour and commodity of your prince and country before all that is private, whereby you have been rather a servant than a commander of your own fortune.' The cost of the three previous expeditions to Virginia had already been enormous, and had been almost entirely defrayed by Raleigh; but on the return of Grenville he lost no time in making another attempt. He selected 150 more men as colonists, with a Mr John White as governor, with a council of government of 12 associates. These he incorporated under the title of 'The governor and assistants of the city of Raleigh in Virginia,' and the expedition sailed from Portsmouth on the 26th April 1587. It suited Elizabeth for the moment to feign a desire to be friendly with Spain, and Raleigh was warned that there must be no attacks upon Spaniards on this occasion; so that the expedition made direct for Cape Hatteras, which was reached within three months. Thence they went to the fort on the island of Roanoak to seek the 15 men left there by Grenville the year before, the intention being to take them off, and establish the new city of Raleigh in Chesapeake Bay. But they found Lane's fort and houses on the north point of Roanoak in ruins and already overgrown with vegetation, and they subsequently learnt from Manteo, the Indian who had visited England, that the little garrison of white men had been treacherously attacked and most of them murdered, the rest being carried into the interior. The Indians on the coast had now grown suspicious of the white men, and stood aloof. To conciliate them, Manteo was solemnly baptised and made lord of Roanoak; forts and houses were again erected, stores landed, and the little colony once more established. But the work of clearing and planting had all to be begun over again, and it was clear that before crops could be produced the stores would be exhausted. The colonists thereupon prayed Governor White himself to return to England in the ships, in order to obtain fresh supplies for them. His daughter, Eleanor Dare, had just given birth to a girl infant, who was christened Virginia—the first child of English blood ever born in North America—and he hesitated to leave his charge and family under such circumstances. After some persuasion, he unfortunately consented to do so, and arrived in England towards the end of 1587, having left in the new colony 89 men, 17 women, and 11 children.

When White arrived in England, the world was ringing with the pompous preparations of the Spaniards for the conquest and domination of England. Philip's 'leaden foot,' after thirty years of hesitancy, had moved at last, and the 'heretic' Queen and her Counsellors were to be crushed for once and for all. Drake, Hawkins, Grenville, Raleigh and others of the same sort, who knew by experience how the English corsairs had terrorised the Spaniards at sea, were confident of success, if only Philip's force could be encountered before it landed. Raleigh wrote that the ramparts of England only consisted of men's bodies, there were few coast fortresses, and that a fleet could travel more quickly than an army, and choose its point of attack where the defender was least prepared. The Spaniard, he urged, must be met and fought at sea. Drake thought so too, and had in the summer, much to the Queen's misgiving, suddenly sailed into Cadiz harbour, burnt and sunk all the ships there destined for the Armada, and had then quietly sailed out again, without losing a man or a boat. If gallant Drake had been allowed to have his way, indeed, unhampered by the Queen's tricky diplomacy, and by the secret Catholic influence at Court, he would have made the Armada impossible at this time. He looked into the Tagus, and could easily have burnt the unwieldy fleet; for, as Santa Cruz confessed, there were no men or guns on board to resist him. As he came home he captured one of the richest prizes ever brought into England, the great East Indian galleon, San Felipe. Well might the mariners be confident, for they knew that the very name of Drake paralysed the Spaniards on every sea; but the men ashore were not so confident. If Parma and the fierce Spanish infantry, the finest in the world, once landed, they thought it would go badly with the hastily raised militia—and they were probably right. But the government did its best, and from Berwick to the Land's End warlike preparations went on ceaselessly. As Lord Lieutenant of Cornwall and Lord Warden of the Stannaries, as well as a member of the Commission of National Defence, Raleigh was busy in raising men and strengthening fortifications; but his main dependence was always, and for the rest of his life, upon the fleet and the seamen.

Everything that could arouse hatred and indignation against the invader was spread abroad. Shiploads of scourges were being sent to score the backs of free Englishman; all adults, men and women, were to be killed; and thousands of Spanish wet-nurses were coming to suckle the orphaned infants. Nonsense of this sort ran from mouth to mouth and was implicitly believed; and the English people by the spring of 1588 had been raised to frenzy. There was no longer any room for doubt as to Philip's intentions. Mary Stuart's death had deprived him of the stalking horse behind which he had worked, and he meant to assert his own claim by descent to the crown of England, and make his daughter Queen in his stead.

For years the English exiles in his pay—the Jesuits and fanatics who swarmed in Flanders, France, Italy and Spain—had been egging him on to this. The English, they said, would have no beggarly Scot to rule over them. England was rich, powerful and Catholic at heart, and would welcome the Spaniard with open arms, to save them from the Frenchified Scotsmen, who would swarm like locusts over the border. Philip had been told this so often, and so long, that he had got to believe it ; and at last, even the Pope and the French understood that the conquest of England by Philip would mean a Spanish domination of Europe. In both cases Philip's diplomacy had cunningly managed to gag them, and they could only look on impotently in doubt and disapproval. But the English it touched more nearly. The Peace Commissioners, it is true, were still sitting at Ostend ; and the frugal Queen had ordered her own warships to be dismantled and paid off. But everyone in England knew that war was inevitable, and whatever the Queen might do with her ships, the privateers and armed corsairs kept theirs ready for action, for the men on board were panting to fight a foe they knew they could beat.

When the land militia were called out, nominally 100,000 of them, though only a third of that number were armed or drilled, Raleigh was commissioned to raise 2000 men in the west country. He had hardly set about it when the peace negotiations in Flanders seemed to hold out hopes of success, and the preparations were suspended. Early in the spring of 1588, he went to his estate in Ireland, and served the office of Mayor of Youghal for that year. On the approach of the Armada, he hurried into the west country again. He was a member of the special commission for the defence of the country against invasion, and had some time before taken a leading part in the construction of the new fortifications of Portsmouth. He now set about raising and arming the west country levies, for which he was responsible, and strengthening the defences of the island of Portland.

On Saturday, July 20th, 1588, the 'most fortunate' Armada was collected off the Lizard; and at three o'clock in the afternoon first sighted some of Howard's ships. The next morning the two fleets were face to face, but the superior qualities of the craft and men of the English had given them the wind; and thenceforward for a week the great galleons, as they sailed up the Channel, were 'pestered by the devilish folk,' who hung upon the flanks and rear—the horns of the great half-moon, in which the affrighted Spaniards sailed. What was the use of bravery? Of what service were great towering hulls and mighty armaments; of the thousands of harquebussiers crowding the decks? They could not get near their foe to board him; for the privateers who had carried their lives in their hands for twenty years had been spurred by necessity to invent ships that could sail round the Spaniards, and beat them piecemeal as they did, until dismay and panic turned the great Armada into a hustling mob, with a hostile fleet, fit and confident, to windward, and a shoally coast to lee; and thus the sceptre of the sea passed from Spain to England.

Raleigh's biographers, one and all, assert that he went on board Howard's fleet on the 23d July with other gentlemen volunteers, and witnessed the rest of the fighting in the Channel. This is just possible, but no more. Not the slightest reference to his presence appears in any of the official correspondence, and in any case he had no command and cannot have taken an active part. Whether he was a spectator or not, he thoroughly agreed with the successful tactics pursued by Howard and Drake. The Council sent Richard Drake to ask the Lord Admiral how it was that the Spanish ships had not been boarded, and Raleigh evidently refers to this question in his remarks in the History of the World. 'Certainly,' he says, 'he that will happily perform a fight at sea must believe that there is more belonging to a good man of war upon the waters than great daring, and must know that there is a great deal of difference between fighting loose or at large, and grappling. To clap ships together without consideration belongs rather to a madman than to a man of war; for by such an ignorant bravery was Peter Strozzi lost at the Azores when he fought against the Marquis of Santa Cruz. In like sort had Lord Charles Howard, Admiral of England, been lost in the year 1588, if he had not been better advised than a great many malignant fools were that found fault with his demeanour. The Spaniards had an army aboard them, and he had none; they had more ships than he had, and of higher building and charging; so that had he entangled himself with those great and powerful vessels, he had greatly endangered this kingdom of England. For twenty men upon the defences are equal to a hundred that board and enter ; whereas then the Spaniards, contrariwise, had a hundred for twenty of ours to defend themselves withal. But our admiral knew his advantage and held it ; which had he not done he had not been worthy to have held his head.'

It is to be remembered, that what was acknowledged to be the best ship in the English fleet, the Lord Admiral's flagship the Ark-Raleigh, had been built by Raleigh on his own plan. It had been launched the previous year, 1587, and had been sold to the Queen for £5000 before it left the stocks. The Roebuck also, which Cecil specially praises as a fine ship, was owned and built by Raleigh, and the gallant Revenge, Drake's flagship, had been partly owned by him. During the troublous time of preparation to resist the Armada, all ships on the English coast were requisitioned for the royal service, and forbidden to leave port. Grenville was fitting out a large expedition for the Virginia colony, at Bideford, when he was stopped. With difficulty Raleigh obtained a release for two ships bound for the West Indies, on condition of their taking colonists and stores to Virginia. The masters took advantage of the release to sail, but with few stores or settlers, and went on a plundering expedition. Off Madeira they were assailed by French pirates and plundered, whereupon, with Governor White on board, they returned to England, and the colonists for a time were left to their fate. Much ungenerous and unthinking odium has been cast upon Raleigh for his supposed indifference to these unfortunate people, and Southey is particularly severe upon him for it. Raleigh had by this time spent £40,000 on the venture, representing in spending power at least four times that amount in the present day, and, as Hakluyt says in a dedication to him at the time, 'it would have required a prince's purse to have followed it out.' Great as his resources had been, he had well-nigh exhausted them. The 'mere adventurers,' as Hakluyt calls them, did not partake of his far-seeing patriotic views as to the permanent value of an agricultural country to be colonised by Englishmen. As soon as they understood that there were no gold mines, their enthusiasm cooled, and no money was forthcoming. Indeed, from their point of view, the speculation was much less promising than plundering Spaniards or finding an easy way to the rich commodities of the East. As a matter of fact, Raleigh for the rest of his life never ceased in his endeavours to reach the settlers he had sent out, although after 1589 his own personal responsibility was a moral one only. In that year he gave to a company, formed for the purpose, the right to trade in the colony, and kept for himself only the fifth of the precious metals, and the chief rents of the land; and in pursuance of this transfer, White again started in August 1589 to relieve the settlers. This time he arrived at Roanoak, and found the colony had been transferred to the island of Croatan, 60 miles further south. White and his expedition set sail for the place, but were caught in a storm, and once more driven back to England without reaching the settlers. Thenceforward the company made no further attempt to relieve them, nor did the Queen help in any way, although the plan from the first had been carried out in the interests of the country, and not in those of the patriotic projector. At his own cost Raleigh subsequently sent at least five expeditions to discover the fate of his people, but always without success. It was afterwards learnt that the whole of them had been murdered by the Chief Powattan, and it was twenty years longer before a permanent settlement of Englishmen was fixed on the northern continent. But no subsequent events can take away the glory from Raleigh of having by his patriotism and example secured for the occupation of the English-speaking race the great continent which now can never be alienated from it, come what may. In the dedication to him by Hakluyt of a narrative of French voyages to Florida, his really patriotic objects are fully recognised. ‘Touching the speedy and effectual pursuing of your action, I am of opinion that you shall draw the same before long to be profitable and gainful, as well to those of our nation there remaining as to the merchants of England that shall trade hereafter thither, partly by certain secret commodities already discovered by your servants, and partly by breeding of divers sorts of beasts in those large and ample regions, and planting such things in that warm climate as will best prosper there, and our realm standeth most in need of. Moreover, there is no other likelihood but that Her Majesty, who hath christened and given the name to your Virginia, if need require, will deal after the manner of honourable godmothers, which, seeing their gossips not fully able to bring up their children themselves, are wont to contribute to their honest education, the rather if they find any towardliness or reasonable hopes of goodness in them.' But the Virgin Queen was not a godmother of that description, and Raleigh's colony got no help from her. Raleigh himself never lost hope or faith. 'I shall yet live,' he wrote, shortly before his ruin—'I shall yet live to see it an English nation.' And so he did, but he was in the Tower a prisoner. In the meanwhile he had by his enterprise endowed his country with vegetable products from abroad, which others had seen and described, but which he alone had utilised. He had impressed upon his fellow-countrymen the indignation which he felt at the arrogant assumption of the Spaniards to the exclusive possession of the western world, by virtue of a papal bull; he had demonstrated that limitless regions of fertile land, with untold natural wealth, were awaiting the benefits of civilisation and Christianity; he had sown the seed of English colonial enterprise, and others were to reap the harvest.

CHAPTER VI

EXPEDITION TO LISBON—EDMUND SPENSER AND THE FAERIE QUEEN—RALEGH AS A POET—PROSE WRITINGS

ADVENTURE was in the air. The dramatic and complete catastrophe of the much-vaunted Armada made Englishmen more than ever confident that at sea henceforward they were to be paramount. The thirst for plunder spread, and citizens of all classes became eager to participate in the rapid gains of adventures against foes whom they had begun to despise. As a thorn in the side of Philip, both Elizabeth and Catharine de Medici in turn had entertained and encouraged Don Antonio, a pretender to the Portuguese crown, which Philip had assumed. From Elizabeth Antonio had hitherto got little but fine words, but the French Queen Mother had aided to fit out two disastrous naval expeditions to the Azores. By 1589 most of his jewels—the crown jewels of Portugal—had been pledged or wheedled away from him, but he still had what is now called the Sancy diamond, and this he pledged, and came again to England. With Elizabeth's aid and countenance a joint stock company was formed to invade Portugal in Don Antonio's interest; he was sure, poor sanguine man, that his countrymen would acclaim him king the moment he set foot on shore; and he promised, if he were successful, not only to reimburse all the cost of the expedition, but to make Portugal almost a tributary of England, and above all to deliver the Spanish belongings in Lisbon to the sack of the men of the expedition. England was excited for revenge and loot, and ruffians, high and low, half the idlers of the Court, the sweepings of the streets, and the scum of the jails, flocked to take part in what was represented as being a pleasant excursion on summer seas to a paradise of plunder.

An army of 16,000 soldiers, with 2500 sailors was raised; and after much vexatious delay and disappointment, the expedition of nearly 200 sail was ready in the middle of April. The chief command of the land forces was held by Sir John Norris, and Drake commanded at sea. Raleigh was one of the contributors to the adventure, and may have accompanied the expedition; but the Queen had peremptorily refused the Earl of Essex permission to join. In the previous autumn there had been a squabble between him and Raleigh, which had led to a challenge, and the intervention of the Privy Council to prevent hostilities. Jealous, doubtless, that Raleigh should take part in the enterprise whilst he was dangling at the skirts of the imperious old lady whom he alone dared to treat insolently, Essex escaped from Court, rushed in disguise to Plymouth, and got on board the Swiftsure, in which the chief officer was Sir Roger Williams, the general second in command of the army. Before his pursuers could catch him, the Swiftsure, without Drake's orders, put to sea. The Queen was frantic with rage, swore that Drake and Norris were privy to the favourite's escape, and thenceforward she had nothing but hard words and sour looks for the expedition. Sir Roger Williams especially was threatened with instant death on his return—a threat, by the way, of which he took very little notice. The Swiftsure joined the fleet after the latter had wasted ten days at Corunna, sacking, burning and plundering, but neglecting the main object of the expedition. When they reached Peniche, Drake, true to his invariable policy of tackling the Spaniards on the water, was for forcing the entrance of the Tagus and sailing up in front of the city. In this he would be supported by Raleigh, and if the plan had been adopted the result of the enterprise would probably have been very different from what it was. But Don Antonio, Norris and Essex, who were no seamen, were for marching over land to Lisbon and besieging it. They had no siege guns or paraphernalia, no proper marching gear, no commissariat, and no medical staff, but Antonio was so confident that Lisbon would open its gates to him, that Drake was overborne; and foolish Essex had his way. It happens that all the historians of the unfortunate expedition were with Norris's force, so that we have no details of Drake's movements, except that he went with the fleet to the mouth of the river at Cascaes to await the return of and re-embark the army. No mention whatever is made of Raleigh, but it is certain that he did not go with Norris and Essex on their wild-goose chase. He and Drake were better employed. During the six days they had awaited Norris off Cascaes they had scoured the seas for miles around in search of prizes, and captured 40 German hulks loaded with goods for the Spaniards. Some of these, and the many other prizes taken, had to be abandoned for want of men; for drink, disease and desertion had reduced the English force to about a quarter of its original number; others were surreptitiously run into remote ports of England and Ireland, and the proceeds of them appropriated by their crews, so that the booty to be divided fairly amongst the adventurers was trifling. In one of Raleigh's prizes, some of Williams's men had been placed to escort it to England, and turbulent Sir Roger, who, henchman of Essex as he was, hated Raleigh, claimed the whole value of the prize, which, he said, but for his men, could not have been brought to England. His claim was disallowed, for the Queen was still in a violent rage with him, and Essex had not yet dared to return to Court. Raleigh, on the contrary, who had had no share in the failure, was welcomed, and received a gold chain as a new token of the Queen's regard. Williams thereupon addressed an insolent letter to the Council, saying that he deserved a chain as well as his fellows. He was probably unaware that only a few weeks before the Queen had peremptorily ordered Drake and Norris to give him a halter.

Before many weeks were over, however, Essex was taken into favour again, and soon made the Court too warm for Raleigh. 'My Lord of Essex hath chased Mr Raleigh from Court, and hath confined him to Ireland' wrote Anthony Bacon's friend, Allen, in August, though it must be remembered that both of them belonged to Essex's party, and would be glad to exaggerate his influence. Raleigh himself appears to have heard some such gossip, for he wrote, after his return to London in December 1589, to his cousin George Carew, 'For my retrait from Court, it was uppon good cause to take order for my prize.' He had other reasons for leaving Court. His great Irish estates were causing him endless worry. With characteristic energy, he was deep in experimental planting, mining, draining, and disforestation; he was splendidly rebuilding Lismore Castle, and was full of schemes for improving his property. But Fitzwilliams, the Viceroy, was apparently his enemy, and favoured squatters and claimants upon his lands, and generally hampered him. His reference to Fitzwilliams in the letter just quoted to Carew (who was then Master of the Ordnance in Ireland) is interesting as showing how his proud spirit chafed at the suggestion that he was a disgraced favourite. 'If in Irlande they thincke that I am not worth respectinge they shall mich deceave them sealvs. I am in place to be beleved not inferrior to any man, to pleasure or displeasure the greatest, and my oppinion is so receaved and beleved as I can anger the best of them. And therfore if the Deputy (i.e., Fitzwilliams) be not as reddy to steed me as I have bynn to defend hyme—be it as it may.

'When Sir William Fitzwilliams shalbe in England, I take my sealf farr his better by the honorable offices I hold, as also by that nireness to Her Majestye which still I enjoy, and never more. I am willing to continue towards hyme all frindly offices, and I doubt not of the like from hyme as well towards mee as my frinds.'

This letter must have been written from London after his visit to Ireland and his short retirement from Court. He was now sure that his transient disgrace with the Queen had passed, for he had with him a new suppliant for her favour. 'When will you cease to be a beggar?' she asked him once. 'When your gracious Majesty ceases to be a benefactor,' was his courtly reply. He was, in fact, never tired of playing the patron and friend of those who sought Court favour. In the spirit of the times in many cases he took care to be handsomely paid; but where poets and men of letters were concerned, his disinterestedness and generosity knew no bounds. Himself one of the noblest of Elizabethan courtly singers, rivalling Sidney, even approaching Shakespeare in his sonnets, perhaps the greatest service he rendered to English poetry was in snatching from obscurity the poet Spenser, and promoting the publication of the Faerie Queen. It was on the visit to Ireland in the autumn of 1589 that he renewed his acquaintance with him. In the rough days of the Desmond rebellion, when the masterful Captain Raleigh was sweeping the rebels from Cork by fire and sword, Edmund Spenser had been the secretary to the Viceroy, Lord Grey, with whom Raleigh had so many passages of arms. The two young men must have known each other then, for Raleigh had already written poetry whilst he was at the Temple, and Spenser had published verse; but their lives had thenceforward lain in different places. Spenser had received the estate of Kilcolman, part of the Desmond forfeitures, and occupied an official post he had purchased in Cork; and on Raleigh's flying visit to Ireland in 1589 they met. What happened at the meeting and afterwards, Spenser himself related, when he returned to Kilcolman in 1591, in his poem dedicated to Raleigh, called Colin Clout's come Home again. He tells how the 'Strange Shepherd' found him

*'Keeping my sheep among the cooly shade,
Of the green alders by the Mulla's shore.'*

and how without envy the two poets compared their songs. Raleigh's contribution to the conversation seems to have been a plaint,—

*'Of great unkindness and of usage hard,
Of Cynthia, the Lady of the Sea,
Which from her presence faultless him debarred.
And ever and anon with singulfs rife
He cried out to make his undersong ;
Ah ! my love's Queen, and goddess of my life,
Who shall pity me when thou do'st me wrong ?'*

Much as Raleigh might complain of the unkindness of 'Great Cynthia,' he was confident, as we have seen by his letter to Carew, of his ability to soften her heart ; and he persuaded Spenser to accompany him to Court and present his poem to the Queen. The commencement of the work had been encouraged by Sir Philip Sidney ; it was published by the advice of Sir Walter Raleigh. With the Queen's patronage the first three 'books' were issued soon after the poet's appearance at Court, and by Raleigh's counsel they were accompanied by an explanatory exposition of the meaning of the allegory. This took the form of a letter printed as an appendix, and addressed to the 'Right noble and valorous Sir Walter Raleigh,' in which the poet's obligations to the favourite were gratefully acknowledged. A pension of £50 a year was bestowed upon Spenser, which probably was sometimes paid to him, notwithstanding Lord Treasurer Burghley's demur at 'all this for a song?' and the poet went back to 'Mulla's shore,' to continue his immortal work, a much more important person than when the 'Shepherd of the ocean' first found him there. Kilcolman, however, was not much more advantageous to Spenser than Lismore was to Raleigh. Disappointment and discouragement came to both the 'undertakers,' though Raleigh fortunately sold his vast domain to Boyle, afterwards Earl of Cork, in whose hands it prospered exceedingly. Spenser clung to Kilcolman until Tyrone's great uprising in 1598 harried his lands, burnt his home, and broke his heart.

Of Raleigh's own position as a poet this is not the place to speak at any length. In a courtly dilettante way he must have written much, and his verse was held in high esteem by his contemporaries, though apparently he cared little for its preservation; perhaps he almost despised his great poetic gift, for he signed hardly anything and printed nothing. He was content to receive the applause of the cultured courtiers, by whom a turn for amorous verse was looked upon as a necessary accomplishment. In the fine sonnet addressed to him by Spenser at the end of the Faerie Queen, a noble compliment is paid to his poetry.

'To thee that art the summer's nightingale,
Thy Sovereign goddess's most dear delight,
Why do I send this rustic madrigal,
That may thy tuneful ears unseason quite?
Thou, only fit this argument to write,
In whose high thoughts Pleasure hath built her bower,
And dainty love learned sweetly to indite.
My rhymes, I know, unsavoury and sour
To taste the streams, that like a golden shower
Flow from the fruitful head of thy Love's praise;
Fitter perhaps to thunder martial stowre,
Whenso thee list thy lofty Muse to raise.
Yet till that thou thy poem will make known,
Let thy fair Cynthia's praises be thus rudely shown.'

The poem to which Spenser refers in the last two lines must have been shown or sketched out to him when Raleigh saw him in Ireland in 1589, as more than one reference is made to it in Colin Clout. The whole of it was thought to be lost, until recent years, when a continuation or sequel to it in Raleigh's hand was discovered at Hatfield, consisting of over 500 lines. The fragment was published entire in Dr Hannah's Poems of Sir Walter Raleigh, and it is there assumed to have been written shortly after the death of the Queen, to whom, of course, the poem itself must have been addressed. Mr Stebbing, on the contrary, supposes that the fragment in question was written during Raleigh's disgrace between 1592-5, and that the references to death in it do not apply to the Queen personally, but to her dead love for him. With this I am inclined to agree, although it would be pleasant to think that Raleigh's regard for his benefactress should have led him to continue to praise her in the time of her successor. The following are the lines upon which the question turns :—

*'If to the living were my muse addressed,
Or did my mind her own spirit still inhold ;
Were not my living passion so repressed
As to the dead, the dead did these unfold.'*

Whichever contention may be right, the poem is a stately one, but imbued, like all of Raleigh's verse, with deep melancholy. With the exception of a few lighter verses, the whole of his poems appear to have been written at periods of disappointment and despondency, as if it were only in depression that his mind was diverted from action. Like many sanguine men, Raleigh must have been easily — though perhaps momentarily—reduced to hopeless misery by failure. Some of his poems of discontent, which do not breathe despair and longing for release by death, are full of almost savage resentment, as in the case of The Lie.

*'Go, Soul, the body's guest,
Upon a thankless arrant ;
Fear not to touch the best ;
The truth shall be thy warrant :
Go, since I needs must die,
And give the world the lie.*

*'Say to the court it glows
And shines like rotten wood ;
Say to the church it shows
What's good, and doth no good :
If church and court reply,
Then give them both the lie.*

- ' Tell potentates they live
Acting by others' action ;
Not loved unless they give,
Not strong but by a faction :
If potentates reply,
Give potentates the lie.*
- ' Tell men of high condition,
That manage the Estate,
Their purpose is ambition,
Their practice only hate :
And if they once reply,
Then give them all the lie.*
- ' Tell them that brave it most ;
They beg for more by spending,
Who in their greatest cost Seek nothing but commending :
And if they make reply,
Then give them all the lie.*
- ' Tell zeal it wants devotion ;
Tell love it is but lust ;
Tell time it is but motion ;
Tell flesh it is but dust :
And wish them not reply,
For thou must give the lie.*
- ' Tell age it daily wasteth ;
Tell honour how it alters ;
Tell beauty how she blasteth ;
Tell favour how it falters :
And as they shall reply,
Give every one the lie.*
- ' Tell wit how much it wrangles
In tickle points of niceness ;
Tell wisdom she entangles Herself in over-wiseness :
And when they do reply,
Straight give them both the lie.*

*'Tell physic of her boldness ;
Tell skill it is pretension ;
Tell charity of coldness ;
Tell law it is contention :
And as they do reply,
So give them still the lie.*

*'Tell fortune of her blindness ;
Tell nature of decay ;
Tell friendship of unkindness ;
Tell justice of delay :
And if they will reply,
Then give them all the lie.*

*'Tell arts they have no soundness,
But vary by esteeming ;
Tell schools they want profoundness,
And stand too much on seeming :
If arts and schools reply,
Give arts and schools the lie.*

*'Tell faith it's fled the city ;
Tell how the country erreth ;
Tell manhood shakes off pity ;
Tell virtue least preferreth ;
And if they do reply,
Spare not to give the lie.*

*'So when thou hast, as I Commanded thee, done blabbing—
Although to give the lie Deserves no less than stabbing—Stab at thee he that will,
No stab the soul can kill.'*

No wonder that a man full of such bitter thoughts and words as these—a man, moreover, arrogant, impatient and proud—was cordially detested by the courtiers over whom he trampled roughshod, and by the people whom he never condescended to conciliate—excepting always his own Devon and Cornish men, who knew and loved him; and this very poem of The Lie brought many retorts from the author's enemies in similar metre. An extract of two stanzas from one of them will show the feeling against him

*'The Court hath settled sureness
In banishing such boldness;
The Church retains her pureness,
Though Atheists show their coldness;
The Court and Church, though base, Turn lies into thy face.*

*'The potentates reply,
Thou base, by them advanced,
Sinisterly soarest high,
And at their actions glanced;
They for this thankless part Turn lies into thy heart.'*

The accusation of Atheism against Raleigh, and also especially against his protégé Hariot, was persisted in during the whole of his life, but, so far as Raleigh is concerned, there does not seem a tittle of evidence to support it; the whole of his writings, especially towards the end of his life, breathing the sincerest devotion.

The following poem called The Excuse is a good specimen of Raleigh's lighter verse.

*'Calling to mind my eyes went long about,
To cause my heart for to forsake my breast;
All in a rage I sought to pull them out;
As who had been such traitors to my rest:
What could they say to win again my grace?
Forsooth that they had seen my mistress's face.*

*'Another time my heart I called to mind, Thinking that he this woe on me had brought Because that he, to love, his force resigned
When of such wars my fancy never thought :
What could he say when I would him have slain ?
That he was hers—and had forgone my chain.*

*'At last when I perceived both eyes and heart Excuse themselves as guiltless of my ill,
I found myself the cause of all my smart,
And told myself that I myself would kill :
Yet when I saw myself to you was true,
I loved myself because myself loved you.'*

His reply to Spenser's address to him in the Faerie Queen, quoted above, is extremely dignified, and will compare with the finest sonnets in the language.

*'Methought I saw the grave where Laura lay,
Within that temple where the vestal flame
Was wont to burn ; and passing by that way
To see that buried dust of living fame,
Whose tomb fair love and fairer virtue kept,
All suddenly I saw the Faerie Queen,
At whose approach the soul of Petrarch wept ;
And from thenceforth those graces were not seen,
For they this Queen attended ; in whose stead
Oblivion laid him down on Laura's hearse.
Hereat the hardest stones were seen to bleed,
And groans of buried ghosts the heavens did pierce ;
Where Homer's sprite did tremble all for grief
And cursed the access of that celestial thief.'*

Nothing of Raleigh's verse has remained imprinted on the mind of posterity ; hardly a word of his poetry has become blended into the common English speech and is unconsciously used, as is the case with certain expressions of Spenser, Sidney, and, above all, the great Elizabethan dramatists, but curiously enough the rhyme of Raleigh's which is best known is a couplet contained in what were probably almost the first verses he wrote. They are three commendatory stanzas, prefixed to a satirical poem by his Temple friend Gascoigne, called The Steele Glass, published in 1576. The middle stanza is as follows, and the last couplet is not infrequently quoted without any knowledge of its origin.

'*Though sundry minds in sundry sorts do deem,
Yet worthiest wights yield praise to every pain :
But envious brains do nought, or light esteem,
Such stately steps as they cannot attain :
For who so reaps renown above the rest,
With heaps of hate shall surely be oppressed.*'

This must have been written before Raleigh was twenty-four, when he was quite unknown ; and yet it is extraordinarily prophetic of the hatred and unpopularity which his own eminence brought upon him.

Raleigh, doubtless, looked upon his poetic gift mainly as a solace in moments of disappointment, or as a means of venting his dissatisfaction, but his deeper studies must have been much nearer his heart ; although, with the exception of his great and really extraordinary History of the World and an account by him in Hakluyt of the loss of the Revenge, none of his prose writings were avowedly published during his life, many profound and advanced treatises have been given to the world since, and prove him to have been in most things far in advance of his age. In his Select Observations on Trade and Commerce, he anticipates nearly all the arguments of free traders; in his Prerogative of Parliaments he demonstrates, far in advance of his contemporaries, that the power of the Crown is strengthened by the maintenance of the privileges of the House of Commons; his writings on the construction of ships, and naval tactics, addressed to Prince Henry, anticipate many of the conclusions arrived at by scientific sailors of our own times, and his political Maxims of State, written whilst he was a prisoner, are full of far-seeing wisdom, and show how unquenchable was still his ambition to direct affairs and men, even from the Tower. This arrogant desire to take the management of everything and everybody was, through his life, the principal cause of his unpopularity. Few men care for another person calmly to assume, as of right, to take the direction of their affairs out of their hands, and this was what Raleigh invariably did in all matters with which he was concerned.

Some of his writings have been lost; amongst them a Life of Queen Elizabeth; and several treatises published under his name are almost certainly by other hands; but the undoubted works of his that remain are sufficient in themselves to establish Raleigh's position as one of the greatest literary geniuses that England ever possessed; and this, be it recollected, was a man who was essentially a man of action, who used his literary gifts not for themselves, but for other ends, to advocate policies or actions, or to prove contentions, not for the sake of literary form. There was, indeed, never a man less vain of literary eminence than he; so long as his writings produced the effect he desired, he cared nothing, what became of them.

Of the History of the World I shall speak elsewhere, when treating of his life in the Tower, but the vast project of the work, in a literary sense one of the greatest ever conceived, proves the indomitable energy of the man and his confidence in his extraordinary powers. Even in a book of this character—treating of far distant times—his intense interest in current affairs, and his desire to influence them, are manifest upon almost every page, where apposite illustrations from his own life, or modern instances gathered from his own observation, supply the principal value of the book to modern readers.

His benefactions to, and support of, literary men were endless. Hakluyt acknowledges gratefully the information, as well as the material aid, he obtained from him. He defrayed the cost of publication of coloured illustrations of Florida scenery painted by the French artist Jacques de Morgues; Laudonnière's narrative of the disastrous French attempts to colonise that region was dedicated to him, both in French and English. He bought for £60 the manuscript of Estevao de Gama's voyage to the Red Sea in 1541, and every Spanish book which could be obtained telling of the continent of the west, was eagerly purchased and avidly read by him. But through all his ceaseless activities, a speculator with shares in every venture, a shipowner with privateers scouring every sea, an active member of parliament, an assiduous courtier, a patient student, a voluminous writer, a great reforming landowner, chemist, engineer, statesman, official, and much else, like a golden vein there ran the determination that his country should oppose the arrogant assumption by Spain of the unchallenged domination of the new world. He knew by this time that the haughty claim was based upon an insecure foundation ; that without the empire of the sea, the empire of the lands across the sea was untenable. He and his kinsmen had proved—if any proof beyond the Armada were needed—that English ships and English seamen were far more than a match for the Spaniards. Hollow pride should be met by pride as haughty but better founded. The Spaniard's loudly proclaimed dominion of the western world must be challenged, and the challenger must be England. This was the master motive of Raleigh's busy life through storm and sunshine ; and however devious were the courses by which he sought to reach it, his goal was immoveable, and he held it unto martyrdom.

CHAPTER VII

THE FIGHT OF THE 'REVENGE'—RALEGH'S PRIVATEERING EXPEDITION—HIS DISGRACE AND IMPRISONMENT—THE GREAT CARRACK—RALEGH AS A PARLIAMENT MAN

ON Raleigh's arrival in Court with Spenser early in 1590, he was received once more into his mistress's good graces, and shortly afterwards the avowal of his rival Essex's marriage with the widow of Philip Sidney raised Raleigh again to his position of chief favourite. The Queen did not fall into ungovernable rage as she did upon Leicester's marriage with Essex's mother, but she insulted the bride, and pursued her with a spite and venom almost incredible, except by those who have studied closely the strange blending of grandeur and meanness in Elizabeth's character. During the short time of Essex's disgrace, and the longer period in the ensuing year 1591, when he was in France commanding the English contingent in aid of Henry IV. against Spain, Raleigh was all powerful with the Queen, and when in the spring of 1591 it was determined to send an expedition to the Azores to intercept Philip's silver fleet from the west, he secured the appointment of Vice-Admiral. It was an enterprise which would, if successful, bring a great profit, and to this Raleigh was never indifferent. The supreme command was to be given to Lord Thomas Howard, and the squadron consisted of five of the Queen's ships, five cargo ships belonging to London, the Bark-Raleigh, and two or three pinnaces. But after all Elizabeth could not spare Raleigh; Essex was away in France, and Hatton was dying; and it was hard to have none of the courtier lovers by her; so his appointment as Vice-Admiral was cancelled, and his cousin Sir Richard Grenville appointed in his stead, doubtless to Sir Walter's discontent. The squadron left England in the early spring, but the silver fleet that year was late. It had encountered heavy storms in the Gulf of Mexico, and other mishaps on the American coast, and Howard's fleet lingered on the look out for it all the summer and autumn. This gave time for Philip to send a powerful escort to bring the silver fleet into Seville, and on the 10th September (N.S.) Captain Middleton, who had been cruising on the look out, came to the English fleet which was at anchor off Flores with the news that Don Alonso de Bazan—Santa Cruz's brother—was in the offing with two squadrons of 53 ships. The English fleet was in bad order with its long waiting. Great numbers of the men were down with scurvy and fever, the ships were crank for want of ballast, and many of the crews were ashore securing water. So short of men were they, that the Bonaventure, one of the large ships, had not sufficient hands to work her, and a smaller vessel had to be burnt and the crew put on board the Bonaventure. The Spanish fleet was fresh, and enormously superior in strength, and Lord Thomas gave the word for the English to get away. So rapidly did the Spaniards come up that some of the English ships had not time to weigh anchor, but had to slip their cables and run. Sir Richard Grenville in the Revenge stood by the longest, to take off the men who had gone ashore; so that whilst the other ships all recovered the wind, and stood off, he found himself jammed between the shore and the Spanish fleet on his weather bow. He still might escape if he set his mainsail, cast about briskly, and showed a clean pair of heels to the foe. His sailing-master advised him to take this course. 'No,' said Sir Richard, 'I would rather die than dishonour myself, my country, and Her Majesty's ship, by flying from Spaniards. I will force my way through both squadrons of them.' Then began that famous fight that great poets have sung and great historians related, a fight that still stands forth as one of the most splendid in the glorious annals of the British navy. No prose story of it is more vivid than that written by Raleigh himself soon after the event. As the undaunted Revenge scornfully sailed on, the foremost ships of the Spanish fleet, surprised, perchance, at the audacity of the act, gave way, luffed, and fell astern of the English ship. But the giant San Felipe, of 1500 tons burden, one of the biggest galleons afloat, came looming up to windward, her towering hull all carved and gilded, and her spreading sails becalming the little Revenge—she was only 500 tons burden—which now lay like a helpless log in the trough of the sea. Then four other great galleons closed around her, two to port and two to starboard, and the Revenge was hemmed in; whilst all the navy of Spain stood by in case of need. Grenville was short handed; 90 of his men lay sick and helpless below; he had no regular fighting men on board, whilst the Spanish ships were crowded with trained soldiers. The tactics of the Spaniards had always been to grapple and board their opponents, whilst the policy of the English was to fire low into the hulls of their enemies and disable them. The Revenge adopted this course as usual, and at three o'clock in the afternoon sent a broadside of bar-shot from her lowest row of ports crashing into the great round hull of the San Felipe, between wind and water. The galleon was too high to train her big guns on to the hull of the Revenge, and was fain to sheer out of the fight, other ships of lower build taking her place. The great galleons closed and grappled, storms of musketry swept the decks of the Revenge again and again. Swarming up the sides came Spaniards by the hundred, only to be hurled headlong back again into the sea. Grinding of timbers, booming of great guns, patter of harquebusses, rose loud over the shouts of command and the sobs of the dying : and still hour after hour the unequal fight went on, till the decks of the Revenge were all bright and slippery with blood, and encumbered by the fallen. Grenville, with blazing eyes and grinding teeth, stood upon the poop of his ship through it all—some say sorely wounded from the first, but in any case there he stood. Once a bold little cargo ship, the George Noble of London, hanging on the lee of the Revenge, came near enough to shout to Sir Richard that they only awaited his commands to take part in the contest. ‘Save yourselves,’ he answered, ‘and leave me to my fortune.’ Through all the day, through all the night, the death-struggle raged unceasing. As fast as one crowd of boarders were beaten back, fresh masses swarmed up the sides, to be met and vanquished, steel to steel, by the dwindling row of heroes that lined the bulwarks of the Revenge. One after the other, the Revenge alone had to cope with 15 great men-of-war, and when the ghastly dawn came she was a riddled wreck ; her decks a shambles, her rigging and spars a hideous ruin over her sides, Grenville mortally hurt, and hardly a man on board unwounded. During the 15 hours fight, the Revenge had received 800 cannon shot and had sunk by her side two of her great assailants.

Then, when all was hopeless, no men, no ammunition, no serviceable arms, Sir Richard ordered the ship to be scuttled and sunk. 'Trust to God,' he said to his men, 'and to none else. Lessen not your honour now by seeking to prolong your lives by a few days or hours.' But most of his men thought they had done enough for honour, and knew that the Spaniards would be as ready to offer terms as they to accept them. So Sir Richard and his master gunner were overborne, and with bared heads the generous and admiring enemies carried the dying hero on to the ships of Spain. All that chivalrous foes could do was done by the Spaniards for the brave remnant of the crew of the Revenge. 'Do with my body what thou wilt,' said Grenville, all helpless now as they carried him from the slaughter house on his decks; and after three days he died on board the San Pablo, his last words being in the tongue of the victors, 'Here die I, Richard Grenville, with a joyful and quiet mind, having ended my life like a true soldier that has fought for his country, Queen, religion and honour.' In the fight the Spaniards lost 1000 men; and a great storm a few days afterwards sunk the Revenge, 15 of the Spanish war ships, and as many of the Spanish Indiamen, with a total of 10,000 men on board, all of whom perished.

Raleigh's eloquent account of this deed of daring, like all of his writings, was evidently written for a purpose. It was, indeed, a vigorous protest—in many places violent and unjust—against the ambition of Spain. ‘How irreligiously they cover their greedy and ambitious practices with that veil of piety; for sure I am that there is no kingdom or commonwealth in all Europe, but if reformed they invade it for religion’s sake; and if it be, as they term, Catholic, then they pretend title: as if the kings of Castile were the natural heirs of the world.’

Unfortunate as was the attempt to intercept the silver fleet in 1591, it was not entirely fruitless, for ‘a Mr Watt’s ship’ brought in some prizes, and a letter from Raleigh to Lord Burghley about the division of the spoil amongst the 12 adventurers is interesting. ‘All of which amounteth not to the increase of one for one, which is a small return. Wee might have gotten more to have sent them a-fishinge. I assure your Lordship whatsoever is taken, fifty of the hundred goes cleare away from the adventurers to the mariners, the Lord Admiral, and to the Queene; the rest being but £14,000 or therabout, is a small matter amounge twelve adventurers; and of which £14,000 the setting out cost us very nire £8000. This is the very trewth, I assure your Lordship before the livinge God, as nire as wee can sett downe or gett knowledge of.’

It will be curious to set forth the actual account of these prizes as rendered, showing, as it does, the shares received by the respective parties. ‘Value of merchandise, etc., captured, £31,150. One third for the mariners, £10,383; for my Lord (Admiral) his tenth, £3015; for the Queen's customs, £1600; cost of bringing the goods, £1200=£16,198. Rests unto the owners and victuallers to be divided amongst twelve, £14,952.' It will be seen that the business of plunder was organised on a thoroughly commercial system.

However the result of the adventure of 1591 may have discontented Raleigh, he was determined to organise a still bolder enterprise for the following spring, and probably his violent diatribe against Spain in his account of the Revenge combat was intended to stir up feeling in England, and aid the procuring capital for the adventure. In this enterprise he himself ventured everything he possessed and more, his principal partner being George Clifford, Earl of Cumberland. The design, as before, was to intercept the silver fleet, and also to repeat Drake's famous coup upon Panama. Thirteen well found and manned ships were provided by the adventurers, and two, the Garland and the Foresight, by the Queen, and Raleigh was to have chief command as Admiral, his Vice-Admiral being Sir John Borough. Raleigh busied himself in his preparations, but before the time came for him to sail, the Queen relented somewhat, and made him promise that as soon as the expedition was well out to sea, he would hand the chief command to Frobisher, whilst he returned to England in the Disdain. Frobisher was very unpopular with seamen, and Raleigh did not like the idea, for, as he reminded Cecil, he had ventured everything he possessed in the enterprise. 'If I can persuade the cumpanies to follow Sir Martin Furbresher, I will without fail returne, and bringe them but into the sea some fifty or three score leagues . . . which to do, Her Majestie many tymes with great grace badd me remember, and sent me the same message by Will Killigrew, which, God willinge, if I can persuade the cumpanies I meane to perform, though I dare not be acknown thereof to any creature.' This was written from Chatham on the 10th March 1592, and already there were rumours of an entanglement or marriage between the favourite and Elizabeth Throgmorton, one of the Queen's maids of honour. Raleigh's enemies at Court were even now whispering that when once his foot was on the deck of his ship, he would not come back until the Queen's anger was appeased. Cecil seems to have hinted to Raleigh that these rumours were afloat, for Raleigh, in the same letter as that quoted above, continues, 'I mean not to cume away as they say I will for fear of a marriage and I know not what. If any such thing weare, I would have imparted it unto yoursealf before any man livinge; and therefore I pray believe it not, and I beseich you to suppress what you can any such malicious report. For I protest before God, ther is none on the face of the yearth that I would be fastened unto.' Westerly winds held him in port whilst he grew more and more despondent. 'More grieved than ever I was in anything of this world for this cross weather.' By the end of May, however, he put to sea, but he had hardly set sail before Frobisher followed him with orders for him to return immediately to Court. Raleigh's heart was set upon the adventure in which his whole fortune was embarked. He had sworn positively—and falsely—that there was no truth in the marriage rumours, and had no relish for going back to Court just then. So he dared to disregard the Queen's positive orders, and went on his way. But discouragement met him. He learnt that no silver ships were to venture out this year; for the Spaniards knew all about his enterprise. Then a great storm scattered his ships off Finisterre.

It was too late in the season now to attempt the attack on Panama, and he therefore determined to leave Frobisher with one squadron on the Spanish coast to divert attention, and send Borough to the Azores to waylay such ships from the Indies as might happen to pass; whilst he, Raleigh, returned home. He arrived in London in June, and was immediately arrested and lodged in the Tower. No reason was ever given for his imprisonment; it is just possible that the ostensible excuse for it may have been his disobedience to the Queen's orders in not returning at once, but it is certain that his real crime was his liaison with Elizabeth Throgmorton. Taking such slight evidence as exists into consideration, it is doubtful whether at this time Raleigh had been secretly married to her, though for the rest of his life she made him a tender, noble, and faithful wife. But the Virgin Queen arrogated to herself an absolute monopoly of love-making in her Court, and looked upon the marriage of her favourites as a personal insult to herself. The friends of Essex were openly jubilant, whilst the Cecils, his enemies, tried their best to soften the fate of Raleigh. Whether it be true that Lady Raleigh herself was imprisoned in the Tower, as stated, is not certain; but in any case the Queen never forgave her whilst she lived, and Raleigh himself, desirous of winning back the Queen's favour, was careful to avoid all reference to the accomplice of his 'crime.' In a letter from the Tower to Cecil, about the payments on account of the uniform of the Queen's bodyguard, he writes in the following inflated strain. The Queen, be it remembered, was then approaching sixty. 'My heart was never broken till this day that I hear the Queen goes so far off—whom I have followed so many years with so great love and desire in so many journeys, and am now left behind her in a dark prison all alone. While she was yet nire at hand that I might hear of her once in two or three days, my sorrows were less, but even now my heart is cast into the depth of all misery. I, that was wont to behold her riding like Alexander, hunting like Diana, walking like Venus, the gentle wind blowing her fair hair about her pure cheeks like a nymph ; sometimes sitting in the shade like a goddess ; sometimes singing like an angell, sometime playing like Orpheus. Behold the sorrow of this world ! Once amiss hath bereaved me of all. O glory that only shineth in misfortune what is becum of thy assurance ? All wounds have skares (scars) but that of fantasie ; all affections their relenting but that of womankind. Who is the judge of friendship but adversity ? or when is grace witnessed but in offences ? There were no divinity but by reason of compassion, for revenges are brutish and mortal. All those times past—the loves, the sighs, the sorrows, the desires, can they not way down one frail misfortune ? Cannot one dropp of gall be hidden in so great heaps of sweetness ? I may then conclude Spes et fortuna, valete. She is gone, in whom I trusted, and of me hath not one thought of mercy, nor any respect of that that was. Do with me therefore what you list. I am more weary of life than they are desirous I should perish, which if it had been for her, as it is by her, I had been too happily born. Yours, not worthy any name or title.—W. R.’

We may be certain that this outburst was not meant for the eyes of prosaic Robert Cecil alone ; but it was too early yet to appease the angry Queen. A little later Raleigh writes to the Lord Admiral Howard, ‘I see there is a determination to disgrace and ruin me, and therefore beseech your Lordship not to offend Her Majesty any more by suing for me. I am now resolved of the matter. I only desire that I may be stayed not one hour from all the extremities that either law or precedent can avouch.' While Raleigh was in the Tower under a cloud, and his enemies at Court and in Ireland striving their utmost, as he says, to ruin him, his good ship Roebuck having escaped from the Spanish fleet sent out to capture her, fell in, off Flores, with the great East Indian carracks, bound to Lisbon. One of them escaped to the shelter of the land forts, and was burnt, but the greatest and richest of them all, the Madre de Dios, was attacked and overpowered by Borough's squadron. The poor Spaniards fought well for three hours, but they were hopelessly outnumbered, their loss was terrible, and they surrendered. Traditions have lingered even to our own days of the excitement in the west country when this, the greatest prize ever brought to England, was towed into Dartmouth. The sacredness of the name of the ship, her great size, and the almost untold wealth contained in her hold, struck the popular imagination. The statement of her purser sets forth that she contained '8500 quintals of pepper, 900 quintals of cloves, 700 quintals of cinnamon, 500 quintals of cochineal, and 450 of other like merchandise, with much musk, precious stones worth 400,000 cruzados, and some especially fine diamonds,' and Hawkins and Raleigh wrote to the Lord Admiral that the value of the prize would probably turn out to be £500,000, although this was afterwards found to be an exaggeration, but the cargo filled ten English ships to bring it to London, and was worth fully £150,000, besides the precious stones and the ship herself. Pilfering of the valuable cargo began before the ship came into port, each man trying to snatch for himself some share of the great plunder. In vain Borough embargoed it all as the Queen's property, to steal which was treason; pearls and amber, musk and civet were portable, and a competency might be carried away in breeches' pockets. The ship's companies were deeply resentful to hear that their master, Raleigh, was a prisoner, and began to get out of hand. Sir John Hawkins then wrote that Sir Walter was 'the especial man' to bring things to order. By appealing to the Queen's covetousness, Burghley was able to obtain leave for Raleigh to go down to the west, still 'the Queen's prisoner, in charge of Mr Blount,' to arrange matters. Whilst this was being negotiated, Burghley sent his son and successor, Sir Robert Cecil, post-haste to Dartmouth to stop the pilfering. Merchants from the neighbouring towns were already dealing in the rich plunder; every cabin of the carrack had been rifled by the English sailors. Hernando de Mendoza, the captain, said that Sir John Borough got nothing, though the search of his chests told a different story. Cecil found that £28,000 worth of valuables had been filched before he reached Dartmouth. In the trunk of one English sailor there was found ‘a chain of orient pearls, two chains of gold, four great pearls of the bigness of a fair pea, four forks of crystal, and four spoons of crystal set with gold and stones, and two cords of musk.’ The Portuguese on the English ships bought or plundered priceless gems; from one of them being taken as many as 320 diamonds, whilst another had a bag of diamonds as big as a fist; an English corporal had a big bag of rubies, and much of the plunder found its way to the East Coast and to London. Sir Robert Cecil’s letters to his father (Calendar of State Papers. Dom.) on the subject are very curious. From Exeter he writes that he stopped every man he met on the road who had anything ‘which did smell of the prizes,’ and brought them back with him. He found the Exeter people backward in revealing the whereabouts of plunder, until he had clapped a few of them in prison, and this soon brought things to light; ‘a bag of seed pearls’ amongst others. ‘By my rough dealing with them, I have left an impression with the Mayor and the rest. I have taken order to search every bag and mail coming from the west, and though I fear the birds be flown—for jewels, pearls, and amber—yet will I not doubt but to save Her Majesty that which shall be worth my journey. My Lord, there never was such spoil. I will suppress the confluence of these buyers, of which there are above two thousand. My sending down hath made many stagger. Foulter ways, desperater ways, no more obstinate people did I ever meet with. . . . Her Majesty's captive comes after me, but I have outrid him, and will be at Dartmouth before him.'

Raleigh followed Cecil close, and on his arrival at Dartmouth the latter writes to Heneage, 'I assure you, sir, his poor servants to the number of 140 goodly men, and all the mariners came to him with such shouts of joy, as I never saw a man more troubled to quiet them in my life. But his heart is broken; for he is very extreme pensive, longer than he is busied, in which he can toil terribly. The meeting between him and Sir John Gilbert was with tears on Sir John's part. Whensoever he is saluted with congratulations for liberty, he doth answer, 'No, I am still the Queen of England's poor captive. I wished him to conceal it, because here it doth diminish his credit, which I do vow to you before God is greater amongst the mariners than I thought for. I do grace him as much as I may, for I find him marvellously greedy to do anything to recover the conceit of his brutish offence.'

Raleigh, as has already been stated, embarked more than all his fortune in the enterprise, the entire amount contributed by the adventurers, except Cumberland, being £34,000, of which £18,000 had been subscribed in money, and the rest in shipping. The Queen had contributed £1800 in money and two ships, so that her proper share would have been one tenth of the proceeds. She was not satisfied with this and wished to grasp the lion's share. The Earl of Cumberland had contributed £19,000 and was offered £36,000, or a clear profit of £17,000, whilst Raleigh and a few friends had contributed £34,000 and were offered a return of £36,000, out of which they had to pay the city of London and others certain amounts, which left them nett losers of £2200. Raleigh was still the 'Queen's poor captive,' but he would not put up with such injustice as this without a protest; the injustice indeed was so glaring that even Sir John Fortescue, Chancellor of the Exchequer, warned Lord Burghley that the 'adventurers would never be induced to further venture if they were not princely considered of.'

The princely consideration ended in the Queen's keeping half of the great booty for herself, and Raleigh barely got his own back again, but after such a rich haul as this she could hardly send him back to his easy prison in the Brick Tower, and in December we find him once more installed in his own mansion of Durham Place, though for long afterwards he was not allowed to approach the Queen.

Raleigh's release from attendance at Court, however much he may have looked upon it as a crushing disgrace, gave him opportunities for employing his great powers in matters more worthy of him than feigned love-making to the elderly Queen and intrigue against Essex. In the Parliament of 1592-3 he took an active part in the debates. He had already established himself as one of the first authorities on parliamentary procedure and precedents, and his great eloquence and clearness of statement are noticeable, even in the summarised reports of his speeches in D'Ewe's Journal of the Parliaments of Elizabeth.

The Spaniards, through the action of the League, had now established a footing in Brittany; and this near neighbourhood caused great anxiety to Elizabeth's government. It became necessary, therefore, to demand considerable grants from Parliament for the defence of the country, and Raleigh took a prominent share in advocating a liberal policy in this respect, not—as he was careful to say—to please the Queen, but because he saw the urgent need of it. He was in favour of dropping the mask and making an open declaration of war. Many persons, he said, considered it wrong to take prizes from the Spaniards under the present circumstances, but if a regular declaration of war was made, no such scruples would exist, and the Queen would have more volunteers at sea to fight the Spaniards than she needed. As usual, in this debate, Raleigh appears as a defender of the privileges of the House of Commons. It had been proposed that the House of Lords should be taken into conference with regard to the granting of the supplies; and this would have been carried but for Raleigh, who pointed out the objections to it. If, he said, the proposal had been for a general conference with the Lords touching the great and imminent dangers of the realm, there would be no objection. The effect would be the same and the privileges of the House preserved. A resolution to this effect was therefore carried.

Raleigh, in this session, spoke strongly in the debate on the question of the alien retailer. It appears that a large number of Dutchmen had established themselves in St Martin's le Grand, which was a sanctuary and extra-municipal, where they carried on a brisk trade as weavers, spinners and retailers of textiles, 'to the great detriment of merchants and regular dealers in our own city, inasmuch that threescore English retailers had been ruined by them since last Parliament.' A bill was introduced to make such alien retail trading illegal, and was supported by Raleigh in a vigorous speech. It was alleged by the opponents of the bill that it was being promoted by 'our mercantile engrossers,' in order that the ruin of the English retail shopkeeper might be imputed to the strangers rather than to the action of what then answered to our modern 'corners' and 'trusts.' The answer to this was that 'engrossing' was quite allowable amongst merchants. 'Others, again, ran upon the more universal topics of charity, in giving shelter and means of getting livelihood to poor, destitute strangers, who fly to us for religion and relief.' Raleigh's reply to the opponents of the bill is extremely curious, touching as it does so closely a burning question of our own day. 'Whereas it is pretended,' he said, 'that for strangers it is against charity, against honour, against profit, to expel them, in my opinion it is no matter of charity to relieve them. For first: such as fly hither do so forsaking their own king; and religion is no pretext for them, for we have no Dutchman here but such as come from where the Gospel is preached. Yet here they live, disliking our church. For honour: it is honour to use strangers as we be used amongst strangers, and it is a lightness in a Commonwealth—yea, a baseness in a nation—to give liberty to another nation which we cannot receive again. . . . And for profit: they are all of the house of Almoigne who pay nothing; yea, eat out our profits and supplant our own nation. Custom, indeed, they pay—15d. where we pay 12d.—but they are discharged of subsidies. The nature of the Dutchman is to fly to no man but for his profit, and they will obey no man long. . . . Therefore I see no reason that such respect should be given to them; and to conclude: in the whole, no matter of honour, no matter of charity, no profit in relieving them.' The bill for the disestablishing the retailing 'Dutchmen' was passed by 162 votes against 82.

Sir Walter, on the other hand, threw cold water on a bill in the same Parliament for the suppression or expulsion of the dissenting sect called Brownists. He had, he said, no sympathy with the sect, but pointed out the practical difficulties in the way of their expulsion, and the hardship it would bring about. In this case the bill was referred to a select committee, of which Raleigh was chairman, and eventually passed in a very modified and innocuous form.

Just before his disgrace, whilst he was in high favour with the Queen, he had obtained, after much intrigue and importunity, the fine estate of Sherborne, in Dorsetshire. The estate belonged to the See of Salisbury, which had been vacant for three years, having been twice refused because a condition was attached to the acceptance, that Sherborne Castle was to be surrendered. At length Raleigh got hold of a pliant cleric named Coldwell, and gave the Queen a jewel worth £250 to appoint him to the bishopric. No sooner was Coldwell appointed than he leased Sherborne to the crown for 99 years at a rent of £260, which lease was almost immediately transferred to Raleigh. This beautiful domain became henceforward for the next ten years the best beloved abode of Raleigh and his wife. Deep in his books, his mind full of vast projects which should bring wealth to himself, and honour to his country, he passed here much of the three years following his so called disgrace; and notwithstanding the heartbroken complaints contained in the fragment of 'Cynthia,' written at the time, to which reference has been made, it is questionable whether this period was not really the happiest in his life. His wife and he were devotedly attached to each other and to their picturesque home; he had a son born to him in 1594; and his building, planning gardens, and planting copses, kept him busy whilst there. His occupations away from Sherborne were still numerous, and prevented him from rusting; if, indeed, such a thing was possible to his keen mind. He still discharged his important duties as Lord Warden of the Stannaries, he was intensely absorbed in his plans at Lismore, in the misgovernment of Ireland, and in the pipe-stave enterprise on his Irish estates; and his palace of Durham House was still filled by his family and a splendid train of followers at least once every year. While at Sherborne he kept up a close correspondence with Sir Robert Cecil, and other friends at Court; he generally had some claim to forward, or some protégé to help; and despondent as his verses are with the perfunctory sorrow considered becoming on such occasions, there is no sign in his letters that Sir Walter had changed from the keen, active, ambitious, brilliant gentleman he had ever been; though doubtless his pride suffered at the knowledge that, at last, his enemies at Court, who for so long had scoffed at him as a 'jack,' a 'knave,' and an 'upstart,' had prevailed over him. The one thing they dreaded was that he should again obtain access to the Queen, and permission to perform his duties as captain of the guard. Sir Robert Cecil and the old Lord Treasurer Burghley, against whom Essex was for ever railing, cautiously did what they could for Raleigh, and at one time, after his views on the severe suppression of disaffection in Ireland had been submitted to the Queen, it looked as if he might be recalled to Court and made a Privy Councillor. One of Essex's friends wrote at this juncture, 'It is now feared of all honest men, that Sir Walter Raleigh shall presently come to Court, and yet it is well withstood. God grant him some further resistance; and that place he better deserveth, if he had his right.'

CHAPTER VIII

GUIANA—THE FIRST EXPEDITION THITHER

IT must have become evident to Raleigh in his comparative seclusion, that if ever he was to regain his influence over the Queen it could only be done by some bold and successful action, which should completely throw his rivals into the shade. The vast plunder from the carrack had done something to rehabilitate his name; but it had not gained him access to the sovereign. As we have seen, the main idea which had run through all the actions of his life had been to prove the impotence of Spain upon the sea, and to assert the claims of England to a share in the territory of the new world. The lukewarmness of 'capitalist adventurers' in his Virginian plans had caused the comparative failure which had attended his efforts. The promptness of the colonists to abandon the settlements, and return to England, as soon as they understood that there was no opportunity of acquiring sudden wealth by plundering or discovering gold, had convinced Raleigh that mere extension of territory for England was a motive not powerful enough to unbutton the pocket of investors, accustomed to the great, if uncertain, profits of piracy, or to induce men to risk their bodies in the adventure. He himself had spent the enormous sum of £40,000 on the Virginian enterprise, but neither the Queen nor the bankers would risk a shilling, and it was clear that the promise of gaining of vast and sudden wealth must be held out as a bait in future ventures of the same sort. Raleigh's own ideas, moreover, were extremely lavish and extravagant. He never hoarded money, and though his revenues must have been very large, his expenditure was still larger. His train was as numerous and splendid as that of the greatest nobles in England, whilst the value of his own attire and adornments were incomparably more costly than any. His buildings at Lismore and Sherborne, his experiments in forestry, agriculture, and industry, were all expensive, and unless he was to fall off and become an admittedly decayed and discarded courtier, against which his pride rebelled, it was necessary that he should somehow obtain the control of vast wealth. If he could at the same time perform some brilliant service to the country and his sovereign, then all might be well, and Essex placed in the background.

He had always been a student of Spanish accounts of exploration and travel. He wanted to learn the methods by which the Spaniards had arrived at success, and the reasons why, in some places, they had failed. 'There was,' says Lloyd, 'not an expert soldier or seaman but he consulted, not a printed or manuscript discourse of navigation or war but he perused, nor were there exacter rules or principles for both services than he drew up; so contemplative was he, that you would think he was not active; so active that you would think he was not prudent.' By Raleigh's own remarks in the History of the World we know that he ascribed the success of the Spaniards to their dogged perseverance in the face of repeated failure, and to their sowing dissension amongst the various tribes of natives; whereas he attributes their failures to disunion and jealousy amongst themselves.

Gold and territory were therefore the talismans that in Raleigh's eyes were to restore him to the first place in Elizabeth's favour. He knew full well that, as she would not make a formal declaration of war, no permanent occupation of territory in which the Spaniards were established would be permitted, even if it had been possible, and the problem, for Raleigh, was to find a place in which Spain had no footing, and yet where the existence of gold in great quantities was notorious, as a bait for capitalists and adventurers. It is hard to see where Raleigh could cast eyes except upon what was called the great empire of Guiana, the mysterious virgin land of gold, which had for fifty years filled the credulous minds of men with dreams of wealth beyond human computation. Thousands of men, expedition after expedition, had set out to follow the glittering mirage, but it had always receded as they had advanced. Through dense tropical swamps, through trackless virgin forests, dark at noonday, over savage mountains and boundless savannahs, men had vainly sought the fabled city of burnished gold, on the brink of its inland sea. Pestilence and famine, savages and wild beasts, fatigue and accident, had stricken down the gold-seekers before they came within sight of the prize. Now and again a famished straggler came back, distraught perchance by his sufferings, with wondrous tales of the marvels his eyes had seen, or his ears had listened to, and the golden fables were sent on their rounds again, to inspire fresh expeditions and renewed sacrifice of human life. And yet, withal, in 1594 the great empire of Guiana was still virgin, awaiting the coming of its captor. Knowing what we do of Raleigh's character and circumstances, it is not wonderful that he was convinced that fate had reserved for him the honour of casting into his offended mistress's lap riches that should satisfy even her craving, and of endowing his country with an empire which should enable her to lower the pride of Spain.

Everyone in England had heard of the land that had come to be called El Dorado, 'the gilded.' Fable had been mixed with fact in such a way that the idea of where, or exactly what, it was must have been hazy, but the name was one that appealed to the imagination, and Englishmen were eager for further knowledge. The story went that one of the Inca princes of Peru, the kinsman of the murdered sovereign Atahualpa, had fled before the Spanish persecutors, across the Andes with some thousands of Peruvians and vast treasures, and had conquered the empire of Guiana, making himself Emperor, with his capital Manoa on a supposed inland sea 600 miles long, the whole empire extending from the Amazon to the upper Orinoco. There seemed nothing intrinsically improbable in these glowing stories to generations that had seen or heard of the sacking of Quito, Cuzco and Mexico; and Raleigh's anticipations as to the natural riches of Guiana itself, for which even Sir Robert Schomburgk thought it necessary to apologise, are now turning out to be well justified. There is not the slightest ground for the assumption that Raleigh deliberately invented the stories about the abounding gold in Guiana, as David Hume and others would infer. The stories told by those who had seen it seemed convincing enough. Robert Dudley, who went up the Orinoco shortly after Raleigh's first voyage, said that he had found gold, and that the natives had brought him plates of the metal. A Spanish soldier asserted on his death-bed that he had lived for seven months in Manoa, which city was so large that it took him thirty hours to travel from the outskirts to the centre, and that when he departed the Emperor gave him as much gold as he and several carriers could convey. The Indians on the Orinoco were all anxious to send the greedy white men farther on, and ever farther on, with golden fables either out of the usual savage desire to surprise and delight their interlocutors, or else to save their own tribes from plunder. Raleigh must therefore be acquitted of a fraudulent desire to deceive. What he did was to place the getting of gold in the forefront of the enterprise, because he knew by experience that that was the only inducement which would lead men to take part in it.

The most recent attempt to open up Guiana had been made by Antonio de Berreo, who had married the daughter or niece of Hernan Perez de Quesada, who had attempted the task many years before, and was the founder and governor of the kingdom of New Granada. He, Berreo, told Raleigh that he had spent 300,000 ducats on his expeditions. He had started from New Granada with 700 horsemen, 1000 oxen and many Indians, and travelled 1500 miles before he could get within touch of Guiana. He appears to have gone down the Rio Negro into the Orinoco, down which river he also went, but for a whole year could hear no tidings of the great empire of Guiana, his company meanwhile dwindling fearfully with sickness and the attacks of the Indians. At last he came to a country called Amapaia, where, after much fighting and many months of residence, he obtained news of Guiana from the natives, and acquired ten images of fine gold, plates, crescents, etc., 'which, as he swore to me and divers other gentlemen, were so curiously wrought, as he had not seen the like in Italy, Spain, or the Low Countries.' These he sent by his colonel, Domingo de Vera, to Philip II. After many fruitless attempts to reach Guiana, of which he heard much from an aged river chief called Carapana, Berreo, with the few survivors left to him, was forced to go down the river to Trinidad; of which island he was made Governor. From there he kept up his attempts to obtain communication with Guiana, and as a preliminary to a systematic attempt at conquest, took possession of the River Orinoco for the King of Spain in April 1593. With the encouragement and help of the home government he was preparing for fitting out a strong new expedition for annexing Guiana to Spain, at the same time that Raleigh had determined, if possible, to capture it for England.

Raleigh's project for a great expedition to Guiana met with opposition from many quarters. He had powerful enemies, and his character did not stand high amongst the people at large. There were persistent rumours that he was either going on a piratical expedition, or else to offer his services to Spain in revenge for his disgrace, and adventurers still fought shy of embarking in his risky enterprises.

His devoted wife, moreover, woman-like, was full of forebodings, and sought to divert his mind from the project. There is a curious letter at Hatfield from her to Sir Robert Cecil (8th February 1594) begging him to dissuade Raleigh from the Guiana enterprise. The orthography is so curious that, as a specimen, it may be given as written by Lady Raleigh. 'Now Sur, for the rest I hope for my sake you will rather draw Sur Watar towards the est, then heulp hyme forward toward the soonsett, if ani respecke to me or love to him be not forgotten. But everi monthe hath its flower and everi season his contentment, and you greate counselares are so full of new counsels, as you ar steddi in nothing, but wee poore soules that hath bought sorrow at a high price desiar, and can be pleased with the same misfortun wee hold, fering alltarracions will but multiply misseri, of wich we have allredi felt sufficiant. I knoo truly your parswadcions ar of efecke with hyme and hild as orrekeles tied to them by Love ; therfore I humbelle besiech you rathar stay hyme then furdar hyme. By the wich you shall bind me for ever.'

During his preparations also other mariners with small forces thought they could forestall him. In a letter to Cecil at the end of December 1594, he urges that an embargo should be placed on shipping. 'For if Eaton's shippes go, who will attempt the chieftest places of my enterprise? I shall be undun ; and I know they will be beaten and do no good. From

Alresford this Saturday after I left you with a hart half broken.'

As a preliminary to his own expedition, Raleigh sent his old captain, Jacob Whiddon, in 1594, to reconnoitre the delta and entrances of the Orinoco. Whiddon seems to have been a brave, simple-minded sailor, who was beguiled by Berreo, Governor of Trinidad, into giving him a full account of Raleigh's intentions, and he returned home at the end of the year with vague rumours of the golden wonders of Guiana, but with but little topographical information.

On the 6th February 1595, Raleigh sailed out of Plymouth, his expedition consisting of five ships and some boats for river exploration. The list of officers who were to accompany him, as given by Raleigh himself, mentions Captain George Gifford as second in command, with Captains Caulfield, Amiotts Preston, Thynne, Laurence Kemys, Eynos, Whiddon, Clarke, Cross, and Facy; but in the account of the voyage, he says that Howard's ship, the Lion's Whelp, and Captain Amiotts Preston's ships failed to join them, and were left behind. Amongst other gentlemen present there seem to have been 'my cousin Butshead Gorges, my nephew John Gilbert, and my cousin Grenville.' Altogether it is stated that there were a hundred men in the expedition, exclusive of the mariners, and from the letter above quoted from Raleigh to Cecil (December 1594) he appears to have again employed the whole of his resources in the preparations. He had obtained a royal patent, addressed drily to 'our servant Sir Walter Raleigh,' authorising him to 'offend and enfeeble the King of Spain, and to discover and subdue heathen lands not in possession of any Christian prince, or inhabited by any Christian people, and to resist and expel any persons who should attempt to settle within 200 leagues of the place he fixed upon for the settlement.'

By the time he arrived at Trinidad, 22nd March, the only ships he had were his own vessel and a small bark of Captain Cross's. With these he remained five days off point Curiapan, the south-west point of Trinidad, now called Hicacos, but could gain no speech of the natives, who were in fear of the Spaniards. Raleigh himself, in his barge, coasted close in shore, surveying every cove and harbour, and describes oysters growing on the mangrove trees, and the great pitch lake of Trinidad, familiar now to all travellers, but then new and marvellous. At what is now called Port of Spain, Raleigh found his missing ships; and a party of Spaniards drawn up on the shore. The latter made signs of amity and of a desire to trade, 'more for doubt of their own strength than for aught else'; and Captain Whiddon was sent on shore to parley with them. After dusk a small Indian canoe stole alongside Raleigh's ship with a chief and another man on board, who had known Whiddon on his former voyage, and desired to give the Englishmen information of the strength and whereabouts of the Spaniards, and especially of the Governor Berreo. The Spaniards, however, who visited Raleigh's ships for trade, or out of curiosity were hospitably received, and from them much knowledge was gained of Guiana. 'For these poor soldiers having been many years without wine a few draughts made them merry, in which mood they vaunted of Guiana, and of the riches thereof, but I bred in them an opinion that I was bound only for the relief of those English which I had planted in Virginia.' On the occasion of Whiddon's previous voyage, Governor Berreo had, it was said, treacherously enticed eight of his men ashore and murdered them, and Raleigh had determined to avenge this injury. He now learned from a friendly Indian spy that Berreo had sent to Margarita and Cumana for some more soldiers to surprise the expedition. The Indians, moreover, stole on board every night with hideous stories of the tortures Berreo was inflicting upon them. 'So as both to be revenged of the former wrong, as also considering that to enter Guiana by small boats, to depart 400 or 500 miles from my ships, and to leave a garrison at my back interested in the same enterprise who also daily expected supplies out of Spain, I should have savoured very much of the ass; and therefore taking a time of most advantage, I set upon the Corps de Garde in the evening, and having put them to the sword, sent

Captain Caulfield with 60 soldiers, and myself followed with 40 more, and so took their new city of San Joseph by break of day; they abode not any fight, after a few shot, and all being dismissed but only Berreo and his companion, I brought them with me aboard, and at the instance of the Indians I set their new city of San Joseph on fire.' It would perhaps be unjust to judge this entirely unprovoked slaughter of Spaniards by the standard of morality existing in our own day, but it will be readily understood that the fact would be treasured up in the minds of their countrymen, as was the capture of the great carrack, and that when Spain had an opportunity of injuring Raleigh it was quite natural that revenge should be indulged in to the utmost. Before Raleigh left Trinidad, carrying Berreo with him, he assembled the Indians and told them that he was 'the servant of a Queen who was the great cacique of the north and a virgin, who had more caciques under her than there were trees in the island, that she was an enemy of the Castellanos in respect of their tyranny and oppression, and that she delivered all such nations about her as were by them oppressed, and having freed all the coast of the northern world from their servitude had sent me to free them also, and withal to defend the country of Guiana from their invasion and conquest. I showed them Her Majesty's picture, which they so much admired and honoured as it had been easy to have brought them idolatrous thereof. The like and more large discourse I made to the rest of the nations both in my passing to Guiana and to those of the borders, so as in that part of the world Her Majesty is very famous and admirable.'

Berreio made the best of matters, and gave Raleigh much information about Guiana, amongst other things that it was 600 miles further from the sea than Whiddon had reported; a fact which was carefully concealed from the men on the expedition, 'who else would never have been brought to attempt the same.'

The Lion's Whelp, and Captain Kemys's ship, which had been lost sight of early in the voyage, having joined, and the expedition being complete, except for Preston's vessel, preparations were made for the river voyage. Raleigh thought that if Preston had come, and they had entered the river ten days earlier, before the floods, they might have reached Manoa, or near it. He was convinced, he said, that 'whatsoever prince shall possess it (Guiana) he shall be lord of more gold and a more beautiful empire, and of more cities and people than either the King of Spain or the great Turk.'

The ships were left at anchor in the Gulf of Paria, and the main exploring party embarked in an old 'gallego, which I caused to be fashioned like a galley, and in one barge, two wherries and a ship's boat of the Lion's Whelp we carried 100 persons and their victuals for a month in the same, being all driven to lie in the rain and weather in the open air, in the burning sun, and upon hard boards, and to dress our meat, and to carry all manner of furniture in them, wherewith they were so pestered and unsavoury, that, what with victuals being most fish, with the wet clothes of so many men thrust together and the heat of the sun, I will undertake there was never any prison in England that could be found more unsavoury and loathsome, especially to myself, who had for many years before been dieted and cared for in a sort far differing.'

Before Raleigh started he had obtained from Berreo, and from the Indians that could give information, such particulars as would guide him in his search for the golden city. It might be reached, it was said, from the point on the Orinoco belonging to the aged King Carapana, or from another point higher up called Morequito, where an expedition previously sent by Berreo had been murdered, except one man, after approaching the confines of Guiana. Plates and crescents of gold, we are told, were possessed in great quantities by the Indians all along the coasts, and even up the Amazon—obtained by trading with the Guianans; and the oft-told stories of the men who covered their naked bodies with gold dust during their drunken orgies, and of the riches, in comparison with which the treasures of Peru were insignificant, were all set forth again to the delight of the English explorers, eager now to start on their quest. When Berreo learnt that Raleigh's object after all was to take possession of the golden land for England, 'he was stricken with great melancholy and sadness, and used all the arguments he could to dissuade me, and also assured the gentlemen of my company that it would be labour lost; and that they should suffer many miseries if they proceeded.' No entrance, he said, could be obtained by the rivers, which were full of shoals; no Indians would approach the English, but would fly before them; the way was long, the winter at hand, the floods near, and all the chiefs on the borders of Guiana had decreed that no trade for gold should be carried on with Christians. This, and much else of the same sort, failed to move Raleigh, who had gone too far to recede, and was in higher hope now than ever.

An unsuccessful attempt having been made to enter with the ships various branches of the Orinoco, Raleigh determined to trust entirely to the poor boats already described. In a heavy sea they crossed the bay of Guanipa, opposite Trinidad, and entered a river which ran into it. Their pilot was an Indian called Ferdinando from the River Barima, south of the Orinoco, who knew but little of the intricate network of rivers on the north of the delta, 'and if God had not sent us another help we might have wandered a whole year in that labyrinth of rivers ere we had found any way out or in. All the rivers and islands, he says, are alike, bordered with huge trees ; and for many days they wandered backwards and forwards hopelessly astray ; until at last, in a river which Raleigh calls ‘ Red Cross River,’ on the 22nd May, they providentially fell in with and captured a canoe with three Indians. ‘ The rest of the people, shadowed under the thick wood on the bank, watched in doubtful conceit what might befall those three we had taken. But when they saw we offered them no violence . . . they offered to traffic with us for such things as they had . . . and we came with our barge to the mouth of a little creek, which came from their town into the great river.’ The Indian pilot and his brother who went on shore had a near escape from death as a punishment for bringing a strange people thither, and in reprisal Raleigh seized a very old man of the tribe, and forced him to guide them into the great Orinoco. A good description is given by Raleigh of the Indians of the delta, whom he calls Tivitivas, ‘ a very goodly people and very valiant, and have the most manly speech that ever I heard.’ They lived, it appears, on the ground in the summer, and in houses built in the trees when the floods of the Orinoco drowned their islands every winter.*

* In Captain Thompson’s map of the coast of Guiana, 1783, the north of the delta of the Orinoco traversed by Raleigh is thus described : ‘ Orinoko islands, covered with palm trees, and overflowed from the end of January to the middle of July. Inhabited by Guaraunas or Tivitivas, whose houses are built on piles or among the branches of the trees.’ This description, it will be observed, exactly confirms that given by Raleigh. Thompson’s map has been reprinted by the English Government in the supplement to the Venezuelan Blue Book.

‘They never eat anything that is set or sown, but only that which Nature without labour bringeth forth. They use the tops of palmitas for bread, and kill deer, fish and pork for the rest of their sustenance.’ On the third day after leaving the Indian town, Raleigh’s boats ran aground, ‘stuck so fast, as we thought, that our discovery had ended there, and that we must have left sixty of our men to have inhabited like rooks upon the trees with these nations.’ The shoals and rapids were a constant danger to them, the dense forests on the banks shut them out from air and prospect, and in the heat and gloom of the apparently endless network of streams, the spirits of the men sank lower and lower. Then, when they at length reached a wider river, the Amana (Manamo), the ebb and flow of tides abandoned them, and all day they had to struggle against the rapid current, ‘or to return as wise as we went out.’ The men were assured every day that two or three days more would bring them to their destination ; and the gentlemen, to encourage them, shared their spells at the oar. At last the companies began to despair, food ran short, the air bred faintness, the work was hard. The pilots were ordered to assure the men that every reach of the river was the last before the destination, where food in plenty would be found, whereas to return meant starvation. The gorgeous tropical birds and flowers, even the luscious fruits, had ceased to attract the weary rowers, when the old pilot suggested that the galley should be anchored in the stream, and the other boats ascend a branch, where, he said, there was a village of Araucan Indians from whom food could be obtained. He assured Raleigh that they could return to the galley before night, and the suggestion was joyfully adopted. But hour after hour passed and the promised town did not appear, until, as night came on, the English were convinced that they were being betrayed. The pilot assured them that the place was only four reaches farther, but four, and another four, having been passed, 'our poor watermen even, heartbroken and tired, were ready to give up the ghost, for we had now come from the galley near 40 miles'; and it was decided to hang the pilot. But then came the thought that they should never find their way back without him. The river was so narrow and the vegetation so thick, that they had to hew their way through with their swords; it was eight o'clock at night, pitch dark, and their stomachs were empty, and yet the poor old Indian kept urging them to row just one reach farther. At last at one o'clock in the morning they reached the village, where after a night's rest they obtained food and returned to the galley. As they came down the river by daylight with lighter hearts now, they saw that the country around them had changed. There were no more dense darkling woods such as for weeks past had closed them in, but flat rolling savannahs, as far as the eye reached. Fine short grass fed great flocks of deer as tame as if in an English park, thick flights of birds hovered over the banks, and vast quantities of fish inhabited the river. What most struck the explorers, however, was the enormous number of alligators, one of which, at the mouth of the river, devoured Raleigh's negro servant. In a few days their provisions were once more exhausted, when they espied four canoes coming down the river. Two of the canoes in despair ran ashore, and the men in them escaped, but the boats were full of cassava bread bound for Margarita, to be bartered to the Spaniards. In the small canoes that escaped were several Spaniards, who were apprised of Raleigh's treatment of their countrymen in Trinidad, and were trying to get away. The capture of the bread raised the Englishmen's spirits. 'Let us go on! we care not how far,' they cried. But more important still, Raleigh, whilst groping about the underwood on the banks in search of the canoes that had escaped, discovered a basket containing quicksilver, saltpetre, and a gold refiner's outfit, and some gold dust. Some of the Indians that had been taken said that the small canoes contained much gold, and Raleigh offered £500 reward for the capture of the three Spaniards, but without result. The chief of the Indians was employed as a pilot and guide, to show him where the Spaniards had laboured for gold, 'though I made not the same known to all.' Tools were required for gold mining, and tools they had none. It was considered imprudent to stay long in the neighbourhood of the gold country, for fear that the crews might mark the spot and sell their knowledge as soon as they reached a civilised country : ‘and all our care taken for good usage of the people been utterly lost by those that only respect present profit.’ When Raleigh reached home, he was blamed for not bringing at least a small quantity of ore from the place, but he defended himself in his narrative by pointing out that the river was rising and the currents violent ; he had been over a month away from his ships, now 400 miles distant, ‘and to stay to dig out gold with our nails had been opus laboris but not ingenii’ ; besides which no sufficient quantity of ore could be obtained without the situation of the mines being made known.

Things were looking brighter now. The Indians were propitiated, and promised protection against the injustice and cruelty of the Spaniards ; the former pilots were sent away rejoicing with letters to the ships in one of the captured canoes, and the new pilot and guide, the Araucan Indian Martin, installed in their place. After much hardship, on the fifteenth day, the eyes of the explorers were gladdened by the sight of what their guide told them were the mountains of Guiana, and in the early evening they glided, to their great joy, into the main stream of the Orinoco.

Raleigh must have reached the main river by the Manamo, and emerged opposite the island of Tortola, the ranges described as the mountains of Guiana being the Sierra de Piacoa and the Sierra de Imataca. They anchored that night near the spot now called Barrancas, and the next day a border chief called Toparimaca came down to see the white men with many followers and presents of food. Wherever Raleigh had come within speaking distance of the natives, he had impressed upon them that he came to deliver them from the cruelty and oppression of the Spaniards, and consequently was warmly welcomed. He was, moreover, throughout the voyage most careful to prevent the slightest depredation or molestation of the Indians by his men, especially in the matter of native women, who, Raleigh says, were very beautiful, and the ill-treatment of whom by the Spaniards was a fertile source of irritation. Toparimaca led the white men to his town hard by, 'where some of our captains caroused of his wine till they were reasonably pleasant, for it is very strong with pepper and the juice of divers herbs and fruits digested and purged; they keep it in great earthen pots of ten or twelve gallons, very clean and sweet, and are themselves at their meetings and feasts the greatest carousers and drunkards in the world.' Leaving here, the expedition passed the island of Tortola, which Raleigh calls by the native name of Assapana, and came to anchor at a place which was understood to be one of the principal entrances to the empire of Guiana. The province had been ruled by a great border chief called Morequito, whose name it bore as well as Aromaia, but Morequito himself having been killed by Berreo, in revenge for the murder of a Spanish expedition, had at the time of Raleigh's visit been succeeded by Topiawari. Two Guianans, who had been staying in Toparimaca's town, were sent forward by Raleigh to a vassal chief of Topiawari to give notice of his coming, and the next few days were passed by the Englishmen rowing westward whilst exploring the river and neighbouring islands, feasting sumptuously the while on turtle eggs, which they found in abundance on the sands. The banks rose high, with a blue metallic lustre, which Raleigh thought was owing to the presence of steel, and on the north stretched the great plains of Sayma, far away over the delta towards Venezuela. They had continued to row gradually up the river until the sixth day, when they anchored at the port of Aromaia, the country of Morequito, and on the following day there came to welcome the white men the King Topiawari, the uncle of the dead Morequito. The old chieftain was 110 years old, and had walked the 28 miles from his town to the port, with presents of flesh, fish, fowl, pine-apples—the 'princess of fruits,' says Raleigh—and much else. Raleigh was gracious and bounteous, giving full value for everything he received; he had come, he said, to deliver the Indians from Spanish tyranny, his Queen being greater and more powerful than the King of Spain. The old chief had himself been the captive of the Spaniards, led by a chain, and had bought his liberty with a hundred plates of gold, so that he listened eagerly to promises of vengeance. The site of the port must have been on the south bank of the river, shortly below the mouth of the Caroni, for the roaring of the falls was audible therefrom; and after much discourse with the ancient chief, in which direct knowledge of Guiana was gained, Raleigh started to explore the interior by the great river Caroni. They thought to have ascended it 40 miles, but so tremendous was the current, though the river was as broad as the Thames at Woolwich, that an eight-oared barge could not gain a stone's cast in an hour, so the attempt had to be abandoned. At last, Raleigh was in touch with the fabled Guiana. Topiawari had told him that his nation, and all those between the river bank and the mountains behind were Guianans, but 'that long, long ago there came a nation from so far off as the sun slept, with so great a multitude as could not be numbered or resisted, who had slain and rooted out as many of the ancient people as there were leaves on the trees, and had made themselves lords of all.' They wore hats and red coats, he said, and lived in houses of many rooms; they had built on the border of their great plain a strong city called Macureguarai, at the foot of a high mountain, and here 3000 soldiers were kept to defend their country. Since the advent of the Spaniards, however, the Guianans and border people had become peaceful, and made common cause; except certain tribes on the Caroni. It was now Raleigh's policy to reach these inimical tribes, and he sent from the mouth of the river native messengers in all directions to call them to a conference with the enemies of the Spaniards. The chiefs told him of powerful nations up the river, who were enemies of both the Spaniards and the Guianans, and who would help him to cross the mountains, and conquer the land, 'where we should satisfy ourselves with gold and all other good things.' In the meanwhile the floods were coming, and it behoved the boats to get away; but it was necessary to take something back beyond Indian promises to satisfy the 'adventurers' in England. A Spanish captain, whom Raleigh had taken at Trinidad, told him of a great silver mine on the banks of the Caroni, and an expedition of five officers and thirty men was sent on foot to explore it, and, if possible, to push forward to the neighbourhood of the frontier town of Guiana, whilst Raleigh and a few followers marched overland to view the strange Falls of Caroni, and the plains beyond. From a hill several miles off, he says, there were visible 'ten or twelve overfalls, everyone as high over the other as a church tower, with that fury that the rebound of waters made it seem as if all covered with a great shower of rain.' Raleigh says he was but a poor footman, and would have been content with a distant view, but his companions drew him on little by little. The country he describes in glowing words. 'The plains without bush or stubble, all fair green grass, the deer crossing every path, the birds towards evening singing on every tree, with a thousand several tunes; cranes and herons of white, crimson and carnation, perched on the riverside; the air fresh with a gentle easterly wind, and every stone we stooped to take up promising either gold or silver by his complexion.' Many specimens were taken home, 'and yet we had no means, but with our daggers and fingers, to tear them out here and there,' but want of knowledge led to the taking of much glittering stuff, which was worthless marcasite and the like. Crystals of various sorts, and many samples of auriferous quartz, were brought to the boats. Raleigh says that he saw great ledges and hills of this 'white spar' everywhere in the neighbourhood. 'Of this there hath been made trials. In London it was first assayed by Master Westwood, a refiner dwelling in Wood Street, and it held after a rate of £120 or £130 per ton. Another sort was afterwards tried by Master Palmer and Master Dimoke, assay masters, and it held after the rate of £230 per ton. There was some of it again tried by Master Palmer, Controller of the Mint, and Master Dimoke in Goldsmith's Hall, and it held after the rate of £269 per ton.'

It was time now for Raleigh to return to the ships.

The swift torrent of the already flooded Orinoco swept his boats towards the sea without labour at a tremendous rate, even against the wind. He called in again at the port of Morequito, or Aromaia, to see the centenarian King Topiawari. Once more the English sailors were gladdened with plentiful and dainty food; for Topiawari loaded them with provender. Raleigh took the King apart and begged him to tell him as a friend of his nation how he should reach the rich and civilised regions of Guiana. Topiawari answered that neither the time of year nor the number of his forces were fit for an expedition to Manoa; and although he, Topiawari, could never hope to look upon his face again, he warned him that the Inca Emperor was so strong that it would be folly to attempt to invade Guiana without a large force and the co-operation of the inimical border tribes. The old King begged Raleigh to leave fifty soldiers with him until his return, but this was impossible, although Caulfield, Grenville and young Gilbert begged to be allowed to stay, for Berreo would be sure to come up the river as soon as possible, and 'I knew,' says Raleigh, 'he would use the same measure towards mine that I offered them at Trinidad.' The old chief, somewhat offended at this refusal, said that as soon as Raleigh was gone the Guianans would invade his country, and that the Spaniards also would attack him; for they had already baptized and dressed a member of his family whom they called Don Juan, and had set him up as a claimant for the throne. He therefore begged Raleigh to avoid all further conference with him for that year, though his followers were anxious for the English to return, and promised to help them to fight the Guianans and recover the women they had stolen from them, for they cared nothing for their gold. After much consideration it was decided not to attempt to attack the Guianan border town that year, but to return with a larger force; and Topiawari gave Raleigh his only son, whom they christened Gualtero, to bring to England. Two Englishmen, Francis Sparry, a servant of Captain Gifford, who could describe a country with his pen, and a boy named Goodwin were left behind at their own request to learn the language; and the former, if possible, to reach the border town to trade and observe. Raleigh then turned his boats towards the east, and swiftly sped down the river. With much cunning he had concealed from the credulous Indians all desire to obtain gold, or dominion over them; or otherwise, he says, they would think there was little to choose between the Spaniards and the English; and he had given 'many gold pieces of the new money of 20s. with Her Majesty's picture for them to wear' more than he had received value for. He had, indeed, quite won the hearts of the simple people, who, long after he was in the grave, looked for his promised coming to free them from the cruelty of the Spaniards. There went with them from Aromaia a chief called Putijama, who prevailed upon them to call in at his port some way down the river, where he told them he would show them a mountain of stones the colour of gold. Wherever Raleigh looked he saw assurance of gold. Auriferous quartz and matrix were scattered on all the hillsides : plates and ornaments of gold, smelted from alluvial nuggets and dust, he was told, were common, though he pretended not to regard them ; and he felt now that, at last, the golden empire of Guiana might be had for the grasping. Raleigh, with others, started on foot to visit Putijama's gold mine at Mount Iconuri, apparently near the subsequent site of Guayana Vieja (old Guiana), but Sir Walter, after a day's march, gave up the quest, and sent Captain Kemys instead, with instructions to rejoin him lower down the river, at the town of a great chief called Carapana. From afar off Raleigh says he saw the great crystal mountain 'like a white church tower of exceeding height, with a mighty river falling sheer over it with a terrible noise and clamour, as if 1000 great bells were knocking against another.'

Carapana the chief had fled for fear of them, but his people were reassured by the English ; and finally, after much danger and many adventures, Kemys rejoined his leader, and the whole party reached the ships lying in the Gulf of Paria without losing a man, except the young negro devoured by alligators.

Raleigh's intention had been to call and succour his colonists on the island of Roanoak, but westerly winds drove him from the coast and prevented him. On his way home he called at Cumana, at Santa Maria, and at Rio de la Hacha, Spanish settlements on the Venezuelan coast, to buy provisions. They were refused him—perhaps naturally—and he retorted by burning and sacking the settlements, though, he says, he found no treasure in any of them. Touching at the island of Cuba on his way, he arrived home in England in August, having been absent nearly seven months.

CHAPTER IX

FRUSTRATED PLANS FOR THE SETTLEMENT OF GUIANA
—SPANISH ACTIVITY IN THE REGION—CAPTAIN KEMYS'S VOYAGE TO GUIANA, 1596—RALEGH AT THE SACKING OF CADIZ

THE one thing that could have rehabilitated Raleigh in the eyes of the world was that he should have returned to England loaded with wealth, and it is somewhat difficult to understand the slight attempts he made to obtain any treasure which might give a show of return for the capital that he and his friends had employed in the enterprise. It is true that he explains it as a matter of policy to gain the Indians, by assuming a complete disinterestedness ; but he must have known that without some tangible result of his voyage it would be difficult to enlist capitalists in the further exploration of the golden empire ; and the neglect of such obvious precautions as the taking of proper boats for river exploration, a few mining tools, and materials for assaying metals, seems to indicate a lack of practical organising power or foresight, which was even more conspicuous in his subsequent voyage. Raleigh arrived home at a time when the English adventurers were out of heart, and the marvellous stories of Guiana were received coldly and derisively. The tales of a nation of men with their faces in their breasts, of the savage Amazonian women, of the golden palaces of the Incas, and the diamond mountain, were sneered at by Raleigh's enemies as so many old wives' tales. They said that the ore brought was not from Guiana at all, but from Africa; that he himself had been hiding in Cornwall, and had not gone with the expedition. Raleigh's answer was the publication of his vivid Discoverie of Guiana, from which the above particulars of the voyage have been taken. In it he vigorously defends himself against his detractors. In his dedication of the narrative to his principal supporters, Lord Admiral Howard and Sir Robert Cecil, he indignantly denies that he has been hiding in Cornwall or elsewhere, or that he had ever intended to become a servant of the King of Spain; 'and the rest were much mistaken who would have persuaded that I was too easeful and sensual to undertake a journey of so great travail. For myself, I have deserved no thanks, for I am returned a beggar, and withered; but that I might have bettered my poor estate, it shall appear by the following discourse if I had not respected only Her Majesty's future honour and riches'; but he says it would ill have become the honourable offices he held to run from cape to cape in search of prizes. To those who said that he had only brought marcasite from the Orinoco, and that the other ore was from Africa, he replied, 'Surely the singularity of that device I do not well comprehend; for my own part, I am not so much in love with these long voyages as to devise thereby to cozen myself, to lie hard, to fare worse, to be subject to perils, to diseases, to ill savours, to be parched and withered, and withal to sustain the care and labour of such an enterprise, except the same had more comfort than the fetching of marcasite in Guiana or buying of gold ore in Barbary.'

But for all his eloquent pleading, the capitalists, and even the Queen, remained cold. His friend Cecil, who got no return for his capital, was dubious, and thought Raleigh over sanguine. When it became evident that the money for a great expedition to conquer the empire of Guiana for England could not be obtained, Raleigh advocated another policy. He drew up a plan, not for conquering the Inca, but for entering into alliance with him against the Spaniards, and making him a tributary to England. He proposed to arm the natives, and with the assistance of 400 or 500 men from England, including armourers, artificers etc., to keep the Spaniard busy, who 'would not threaten us with any more invincible Armadas.' The Incas should be encouraged to attack the Spaniards in Peru; they should be shown how rich and powerful England was, should be introduced to our commodities ; a certain number of them every year should be brought to England to educate and civilise, married to English women, and sent back to instruct their fellows. It was proposed 'that they should pay a tribute, and assign to the crown some rich mines, and rivers of gold, pearls, silver, rocks of precious stones, with some large fruitful countries for the planting of colonies of Englishmen.' Raleigh had no doubt, he said, that after the country had been colonised for a year or two, he should see in London 'a contraction house of more receipt for Guiana than that of Seville for the West Indies.'

'The object of the voyage to Guiana,' he says, 'is to subdue and annex it to the crowne imperiall of this Realme of England,' and he proceeds to show that the enterprise would be honourable, profitable, necessary, and cheap. 'The Queen's dominions may be exceedingly enlarged, and this realm of England inestimably enriched.' But though Elizabeth was willing enough to be inestimably enriched by the efforts and expenditure of others, not a ship nor a ducat would she contribute herself.

The Spanish government, slow as it usually was, did not take the matter so coolly. The slaughter at Trinidad and the kidnapping of Governor Berreo had aroused much indignation, and immediate attempts were made to forestall Raleigh's return to Orinoco. Berreo had been landed at Cumana, a settlement on the Venezuelan mainland, Trinidad being left entirely in the hands of the Indians. Soon after Raleigh's departure there arrived Colonel de Vera, whom Berreo had sent to Spain with the golden images obtained from Guiana, and the wonderful stories the Spanish expedition had heard of the wealth of the interior. De Vera had managed to enlist the interest both of the Spanish Government and the merchants of Seville, and returned with a formidable expedition of five or six ships and 2000 men, for the purpose of taking possession of Guiana. In the meanwhile, the Governor of Cumana, Roque de Montes, on hearing Berreo's tale of Raleigh's attack, sent Captain Felipe de Santiago to fix a new Spanish settlement in Trinidad, and then to go up the Orinoco, and report upon the best sites on the river for the establishment of Spanish forts. His reports to his chief, and those of the latter to the King of Spain, are now in the Archives of the Indies at Seville; and prove how jealous the Spanish Government was of Raleigh's attempt to establish the English power in the region. Writing on the 2nd November 1595, describing the mouths of the Orinoco, he says, 'There is another mouth called the Manamo, by which it is known that the Englishman, Guaterral (i.e., Walter Raleigh), entered the Orinoco in the present year 1595, after having caused much trouble and injury to the Isle of Trinidad and its inhabitants. He left two young Englishmen in the Orinoco for the purpose of learning the language and obtaining all information of the country, for on his departure it is said he left with the intention of returning hither.' The report of this captain (De Santiago) with regard to the wealth of Guiana in gold is more glowing even than that of Raleigh, though he says that the Indians 'are very watchful, and always endeavour to conceal it for fear of the Spaniards, whom they fear and dislike, and much dread they may settle there.' He recommends the establishment of the first Spanish post about six miles above Morequito's town, not far from the mouth of the Caroni, the place apparently where subsequently the original town of San Thomé stood. It will be necessary to bear well in mind the exact position of this post, as the final accusations against Raleigh largely turned upon the question. The Governor of Cumana, a few months afterwards, writing to the King, says, 'I also instructed him (De Santiago) to apprehend two Englishmen whom Guaterral left there last year, 1595, with the intention of returning, and settling it, for the purpose of their becoming acquainted with the country and its best sites, and learning the language of the natives. I also instructed the captain to advise the chiefs of Indians on the bank not to receive any strangers in their territories, except Spaniards in Your Majesty's service.' It appears from the Governor's report that Santiago had captured in Morequito's country the man Francis Sparry, and had learnt that the other lad had been devoured by a tiger.* This latter was not the case, as Raleigh's second expedition in 1617 found the lad Goodwin, though he had almost forgotten his own language. Sparry was kept prisoner by the Spaniards until 1602, when he returned to England, and gave a glowing account, quoted by Purchas, of the abundance of auriferous quartz in the country.

On his way up the Orinoco, Santiago met Berreo with the new Spanish expedition ; and they immediately came to loggerheads about the resettling of Trinidad. Berreo said that he had been appointed Governor of the island by the King, and the Governor of Cumana had no business to interfere, but it was eventually decided that Santiago should return to Trinidad and build the new settlement, whilst Berreo remained on the Orinoco. The Governor writes then to the King, 'It is of the utmost importance to Your Majesty's service that the banks of the Orinoco should be settled, and I have considered well to push the matter forward, and in like manner the navigation for trade, both to New Granada and Trinidad, up and down the river. Particularly is this matter important for the conquest and settle-

* Oldys must have gathered the information that Goodwin had been devoured by a tiger from Spanish sources. Recent writers on the subject express curiosity as to where he could have obtained it, but we see by the above letter that the intelligence was sent to the King of Spain, and was doubtless current amongst Spaniards. The tale was evidently invented by the Indians to prevent the capture of Goodwin by Captain de Santiago.

ment of the provinces of Guiana, Caura and El Dorado; for this is the entry and road to attain that which those provinces give promise of. Thus no opportunity will be given to the enemy of settling it, nor will they have any entry to it by any other way, for according to the intention of Guaterral, who surveyed the whole of it last year, he will keep his promise and fulfil his bad purpose.'

This was written in April 1596. Poor 'Guaterral,' in the meanwhile, had been almost in despair. He knew that Berreo, with the new expedition, had gone up the Orinoco as soon as he had left it; and he had prayed and besought in vain that England should not forego the possession of the rich empire which he held before her. Cecil and Howard were incessantly importuned, but with all his efforts he could do no more than fit out two ships, the Darling and the Discovery, under Captain Kemys, laden with 'merchandise to comfort and assure the Indians,' and persuade them not to make any arrangement with the Spaniards. If he could keep them free, he thought, perhaps the eyes and pockets of England might be opened by his persuasion, and the rich prize fall to his country after all. Practically all the cost of the expedition was defrayed by Raleigh and the Cecils, Lord Burghley contributing £500, and Sir Robert a fully furnished ship. Kemys left Portland on the 26th January 1596. When he arrived in the Orinoco, he found, as he says, that Berreo had got the start of him, and had established the post shortly beyond Morequito or Topiawari's town, and below the mouth of the Caroni, a rocky islet in mid-stream having been made into a fort of refuge in case of need. Kemys anchored within musket shot of the town, and learnt that the Spaniards were lying in ambush at the mouth of the stream, 'to defend the passage to the mines whence the ore came from last year.' An Indian spy in friendly guise came on board and attempted to frighten the English by exaggerating the Spanish strength, but at last confessed that Berreo had only fifty men with him, who had taken refuge in the woods. Topiawari, he said, was dead, though this was untrue, and the Indians had fled and dispersed. Topiawari's son, Gualtero, now in England, was consequently King of the tribe, and his people were being led in his absence by Putijama, who had taken refuge near Mount Aio, where he had shown Kemys the rich mine in the previous year. The expedition consequently dropped down the river again to Putijama's town, but found the Indians had fled. One that was left offered to lead Kemys to a very rich mine in a mountain 15 miles off, so rich that it had been jealously kept from the Spaniards, and even the Indians were warned away from the mountains by their chiefs, by fables of devouring dragons and other terrible tales. The Indian promised that, if the English would bring a good store of wine, he would exorcise the dragon. Kemys, however, was afraid of going, for it might open the eyes of the Spaniards; and the baptised Indian Don Juan, the cousin of Gualtero, who sought to usurp the kingdom, might help them to the possession of the mine. So Kemys somewhat lamely returned, capturing some Indian emissaries of Berreo's on the way to the coast for reinforcements, and arrived back in England at the end of June. The news he brought was a bitter disappointment to Raleigh's friends, for the Spaniards had now established a strong foothold near the mouth of the Caroni, one of the principal entrances to the coveted golden empire. Raleigh himself was away with the fleet at Cadiz when his captain returned, but Lady Raleigh thus wrote to Sir Robert Cecil on the tidings he brought. 'Thus you hear your poor absent friend's fortune, who if he had been as well credited in his reports and knowledge as it seemeth the Spaniards were, they had not been possessors of that place.' Nothing seems to have rankled in the minds of Raleigh and his wife so much as the sneers of his enemies that he was telling lies about the wealth of Guiana. He wrote from Sherborne to Cecil shortly before Kemys sailed. 'What becomes of Guiana I much desire to hear—whether it pass for a history or a fable. I hear Mr Dudley and others are sending thither; if it be so, farewell all good from thence. For although myself—like a cockscomb—did rather prefer the future in respect of others, and rather thought to win the Kings to Her Majesty's service than to sack them, I know what others will do when those Kings shall come simply into their hands.' Raleigh was ahead of his times. He kept sturdily through all disappointments to his main object, namely to win a great colonial empire for England, and it is pathetic to note how he was blindly thwarted by others, whose only aim, as he says, was their own immediate profit.

On his return Kemys wrote a narrative of his voyage, which was as vigorous an appeal to the patriotism of his fellow-countrymen as that of his chief had been. 'Look,' he says, 'how eager the Spaniard is to forestall us in Guiana. He was preparing an expedition of 600 families to send thither, but the ships were burnt in Cadiz. They are busy whilst we are idly waiting for news which we straightway forget when we have heard them.' Are the Spaniards, he asks, more able than we? Have they more men to spare? Do they love their country more? and he gives a tremendous negative to all these questions, and urges Englishmen to seize the opportunity before it is too late. Kemys's final exhortation is as persuasive as a modern company prospectus. 'It is fit only for a prince to begin and aid this worke; the maintenance and ordering thereof requiring sovereign power, authoritie and commandment. The river of Raleana (Orinoco) giveth upon and free passage, any provision that the Spaniards can make to the contrary notwithstanding (for once a year the lands near the river be all drowned), to convey men, horses, munitions and victuals, for any power of men that shall be sent thither.

‘I doe speak it on my soul’s health, as the best testimonie that I can in any case yield to averre a truth, that having been now the second time in this countrey, and with the helpes of time and leisure well advised myself upon all circumstances to be thought of, I can discern no competant impediment, but that with a sufficient number of men, Her Majesty may, and her successors, enjoy this rich and great empire; and having once planted there, may for ever (with the favour of God) holde and keepe it contra Judæos et Gentes.’ He points out that the enterprise might easily be effected by ‘adventurers,’ but that that course would bring no permanent benefit to the nation, for they, he says, would return home with gold, and care nothing for holding the place as a colony for the English crown.

Kemys’s account is prefaced by a long, fervid poem to the same effect, two or three stanzas of which may be quoted to show how earnestly Raleigh desired the Queen to accept Guiana as an English colony, Kemys’s narrative, like his voyage, of course, being inspired by his master.

‘*Guiana, whose rich seat are mines of gold;
Whose forehead knockes against the rooffe of stars;*

*Stands on her tiptoes at fair England looking,
Kissing her hand, bowing her mighty breast;
And every sign of all submission making,
To be her sister, and her daughter both,
Of our most sacred maide. . . .*

*'Then, most admirèd sovereign, let your breath Goe forth upon the waters and create
A golden world in this our yron age.'*

A fervent appeal is made to the belief and courage of prospective adventurers in the golden promises held out to them, but care is taken to make it clear that gold is not the only thing to be thought of, and that work and livelihood await any number of colonists who may go thither, 'where learning doth not eat its thriftless books, nor valour consume its useless arms.'

*'But all our youth take Hymen's lights in hand
And fill each rooffe with honoured progenie.*

*'And there do palaces and temples rise
Out of the earth and kiss enamoured skies,
Where new Britannia humbly kneels to heaven,
The world to her, and both at her blest feet,
In whom the circles of all empires meet.'*

But it was all of no avail. Mismanagement and parsimony had brought to a disastrous end Drake and Hawkins's last expedition to the West Indies. Both great sailors had died broken-hearted, and once more for a brief season it seemed as if the naval supremacy of Spain was to be reasserted. The operations of the League had given Philip a footing in northern France, with possession of the port of Blavet in Brittany, whence the invasion of England might be undertaken. Spanish aid had already been promised to Tyrone in Ireland, and English spies were reporting great naval preparations in various Spanish ports. The capacity for harm of Philip at the time we know now to have been very small indeed, but thanks in part to the bombastic boasting of his own officers, an exaggerated fear of Spain again took possession of the English. For a considerable time the traitor Antonio Perez had been living with Essex, endeavouring to inflame him, and through him Elizabeth, into offensive warfare against his deadly enemy Philip. Essex never required much urging in such a case, but Elizabeth hesitated long before she openly committed herself to a change of policy from that which had served her so well. Raleigh, with Guiana always in his mind, was anxious to cripple Spain to an extent which should make her powerless to send forces to the Orinoco, and this identity of views for once drew the two rivals together. It was decided to fit out a fleet of ninety-six sail which were joined by twenty-four Dutch ships, the number of men being in all 16,600; the Lord Admiral Howard being in supreme command at sea, and Essex on land, an arrangement which very nearly brought about the failure of the expedition, old Howard protesting against it, as he said he was 'only to be used as a drag.' Orders were sent early in April for levies of men to be made in the counties, but the ink on the orders was scarcely dry before the Queen changed her mind, and countermanded them, and thenceforward for weeks hardly a day passed without some new resolution being arrived at, Essex the while fuming and raging to an extent which made him lose respect for the Queen. Elizabeth, it is plain, dreaded the capture of any important Spanish city. This would have been an embarrassment to her, and, as she pointed out, would not bring her any profit, as the soldiers would get out of hand and plunder on their own account. What she desired, and in this she was all through earnestly seconded by Raleigh, was to strike a decisive blow at Spain's navy. The English pressed men had no stomach for the job, and it was only with the greatest difficulty that the force could be got together. Raleigh was to organise a squadron in the Thames, and take it round to Plymouth to join the rest of the fleet, but was delayed by head winds and other causes, whereupon, as usual, his enemies began to cavil. Anthony Bacon, Essex's hanger-on, more ungenerous than his master, hinted that Raleigh was lingering for a dishonest purpose of his own. Raleigh wrote a letter on the 4th May from Northfleet to Cecil, in which it is clear that he had heard these rumours. 'As fast as wee press men one day, they come away another and say they will not serve. . . . I cannot write to our Generalls att this tyme, for the pursevant found me in a countre villag a mile from Gravesend honting after runaway mariners, and dragging in the mire from ale-house to ale-house, and could gett no paper, butt that the pursevant had this peece.

‘Sir, by the living God, there is nor King nor Queen nor general nor any elce can take more care than I do to be gonn. Butt I humblie pray yow butt to speak with Mr Borrough, and lett hyme be sent for afterward before my Lorde Chamberlayne, that they may hear hyme speak whether any man can gett down with this wind or no ; which will satisfy them of me.’

At length the force was collected and sailed from Plymouth Sound on the 3rd June. There were four English squadrons, one of which with twenty-two ships from the Thames was under the command of Raleigh as Vice-Admiral, the Dutch fleet being under Maurice of Nassau. A council of war was appointed to advise Essex and Howard, consisting of Raleigh and Lord Thomas Howard, for the navy, and Sir Conyers Clifford, Sir George Carew and Sir Francis Vere for the troops. Philip was usually well served by his spies in English ports, but on this occasion they gave him but inadequate and tardy information, for the men on the fleet itself were ignorant of its destination ; and at dawn on the 20th June, the affrighted citizens of Cadiz beheld the fleet in the offing. Cadiz was the richest city in Spain, the port whither the silver ships of the Indies brought their precious freight. The defences of the place were old and crumbling, the guns obsolete, and the fighting men few. That the English should await the flotilla from the Indies, that it should pounce upon the Azores, was known to be not improbable ; but that an overwhelmingly powerful fleet like this should come to Cadiz itself had not been anticipated, and the people were taken by surprise. Under the surf-beaten walls of the harbour there lay a fleet of eight war galleys, their prows towards the entrance ; further in there were six great galleons, and eleven frigates of war, with forty cargo ships behind them loading for New Spain, with three strongly armed ships to convoy them on their voyage.

Whilst the main body of the English fleet anchored in the bay of St Sebastian, a mile and a half from Cadiz, Raleigh's squadron was sent round the western or Rota side of the bay of Cadiz to intercept any ships that attempted to escape either from there or from San Lucar. In his absence, a council of war was called by the Lord Admiral, and the movement amongst the English ships in consequence was construed by the watching Spaniards into fear of the formidable array of Spanish ships in the bay. The Lord Admiral, whose experience of actual warfare was small, was always on the side of prudence, and apparently was also undesirous of venturing into the harbour under the combined fire of the ships and the forts. He agreed with Essex that the town should be attacked and captured first, and the shipping dealt with afterwards. A heavy southerly swell was rolling, and when Raleigh arrived to attend the council, two hours after the rest, he found Essex embarking his troops in boats to land and attack the town on the west side. The manœuvre was a most dangerous one; several boatloads of men were swamped before they left the side, and Raleigh was horrified at the blunder which was about to be committed. To have desisted at his sole representation after the council of war had decided, would have looked like fear on the part of Essex. Rash and injudicious as the latter was, however, he knew that Raleigh had a greater and more varied experience of fighting and navigation than all the rest of the council put together, and agreed that, if Raleigh came on board his ship and protested formally in presence of the Colonels against the decision, giving reasons why the course proposed might lead to the destruction of the whole force, he, Essex, would desist. It was all the Lord Admiral's fault, he said, who would not enter the harbour until the town had been secured. The experienced officers on the fleet coincided with Raleigh's views, and with difficulty the Lord Admiral was at last persuaded. It was evening now; and as Raleigh's barge passed Essex's ship on his way from his interview with Howard, the young Earl, eager for action as usual, whether on sea or land, was awaiting on his deck the news of the chief's decision. Raleigh shouted in Spanish as he passed that the fleet was to enter, and Essex, full of exaltation, waved his plumed hat around his head and cast it into the sea with a cheer of delight.

On land, the women and non-combatants had crowded into the citadel, and the men who flocked in from the outskirts were hastily armed. The Duke of Medina Sidonia, Governor of Andalucia, was at his house at San Lucar, but was summoned in all haste, whilst the Admiral in command, Diego de Sotomayor, put his ships in order of battle. But Philip's rigid system of centralisation had sapped the initiative of his officers everywhere. They were so accustomed to be minutely directed from the Escorial, that when they were thrown upon their own resources they were at a loss. Medina Sidonia was a broken reed to lean upon—it was the same poor-spirited simpleton who had lost the Armada—but even he was absent until far into the night, and only arrived in time to record minutely the successive stages of the disaster.

On the English fleet Raleigh was tacitly admitted in the moment of danger to be the natural leader. Both Howard and Essex claimed the honour of leading the van, and the matter was disputed for hours; as in the case of Drake and Norris at Lisbon in 1589 a divided command always led to trouble. At length it was decided that Raleigh should lead the advance-guard, despite the protestations of Lord Thomas Howard. Raleigh's ship, the Warsprite, was to be followed by the Mary Rose, under his cousin and friend, Sir George Carew, the Rainbow, under Sir Francis Vere, the Lion, under Sir Robert Southwell, the Dreadnought, under Sir Conyers Clifford, and the Nonpareil, under Robert Dudley. Lord Admiral Howard, Essex, and Lord Thomas Howard were to command the main body of the fleet in the rear of Raleigh's squadron, but Lord Thomas was determined to be first if he could, and during the night induced Robert Dudley to change ships with him, in the hope that in the confusion he might push ahead of Raleigh. The latter was equally determined that he should not; and at the first streak of dawn he gave the signal and got under way with a good start before all the others. During the night he had sent to the Lord Admiral his views as to how the attack should be effected. He had, as usual, a keen eye to the main chance, and foresaw that the Spaniards would burn their ships rather than surrender them, and in order to prevent this induced the Lord Admiral to appoint two large fly-boats to board the great galleons, after the big guns on the English fleet had done their work. The entrance to the harbour was commanded by the guns of the forts, and the galleys were ranged just inside. The Warsprite, well ahead of the squadron, bore the brunt of the fire, but disdained to notice 'the wasps,' except by a derisive flourish of trumpets for each discharge. Metal more attractive than galleys was before Raleigh's eager eyes. Straight ahead of him were the four greatest galleons in Philip's fleet, and foremost of them was that towering San Felipe and the San Andres that had attacked the Revenge four years before. 'The San Felipe, the great and famous admiral of Spain, was the mark I shot at . . . being resolved to be revenged for the Revenge, or to second her with mine own life.' Gallant Grenville was not forgotten by his kinsman, and the hour of vengeance had come. It had been decided by Sotomayor that, if the English should enter in force, the Spanish war ships should withdraw to the narrow channel between the castle of Matagorda and Puntales, to prevent the English from penetrating the inner harbour of Puerto Real, where there lay the Indian flotilla with cargoes worth eight millions of ducats. It was an unfortunate decision for the Spaniards, adopted at the instance of the representative of the merchants of Seville, to whom the cargoes belonged, for it left the city of Cadiz at the mercy of the enemy. Like a bridge across the channel stretched the four great galleons of Spain, two of Portugal, three argosies and three frigates, the rest of the war-ships being formed in a second line of defence behind them. Straight as a hawk upon its quarry went the Warsprite to the San Felipe, disdain- ing to fire a gun at those who sought to stop her. Raleigh anchored on the north or Matagorda side of the galleon, between her and the San Andres, the Lyon shortly afterwards anchoring close by him, whilst the Dreadnought and the Mary Rose took up their positions on the south or Puntales side of the San Felipe. Then for three hours they pounded away point blank at each other, 'as two butts.' At ten o'clock in the morning Essex could keep out of the fray no longer, and in defiance of all arrangements, pushed ahead through the fleet till he came to Raleigh's side. 'Always,' says Sir Walter, 'I must without glory say for myself, that I held single in the head of all.' Meanwhile the fly-boats for boarding came not, and Raleigh, losing patience, was determined to wait no longer, but to board from the Queen's ships, in defiance of his own plans. But Essex was his senior in command, and he sought to obtain his permission to do this. He hastily went on board the Swiftsure, the Earl's flagship, for the purpose. 'It is the same loss to burn or sink,' he said, 'and I must endure one or the other'—for the Warsprite was riddled with cannon shot. Essex tried to dissuade him, not very earnestly we may be sure, but when he found 'it was not in his power to command fear, he told me that whatsoever I did, he would second me in person ; upon his honour.' During Raleigh's short absence from his ship jealous Vere pushed the Rainbow ahead of her, and Lord Thomas, envious in his turn, thrusting forward the Nonpareil, with the Lord Admiral himself on board, tried to get in front of him. When Raleigh returned to the Warsprite, 'from being first he found himself to be but third.' This he could not brook, so, forcing his ship between the other two, he went right ahead, and lay across the channel. 'I was very sure that none would outstart me again for that day'—and none did, although Vere made another attempt by secretly fastening a hawser to the Warsprite's side, 'when we were all too busy to look behind us,' and began hauling himself abreast of Raleigh's ship; 'but some of my company advertising me thereof I caused it to be cut, and so he fell back into his place. I guarded him, all but his very prow, from the sight of the enemy.' Raleigh was sternly determined that not even Vere should baulk him of his vengeance upon the San Felipe. As soon as he was again face to face with his foe, he laid a warp on board of her and began hauling alongside; the Repulse on the other side did the same, and the Nonpareil likewise. This was the last straw. A hideous panic seized the Spaniards. They slipped their cables, ran on the mud, for the channel is very narrow, and 'tumbled into the sea heaps of souldiers, so thick as if coals had been powred out of a sack, in many ports at once; some drowned, some sticking in the mud.' The San Felipe and the San Tomas were fired by their crews, the San Mateo and the San Andres were captured by Raleigh. 'The spectacle,' says Raleigh, 'was a very lamentable one; for many drowned themselves; many, half burnt, leapt into the water; very many hanging by ropes' ends by the ships' side under water, even to the lips; many swimming with grievous wounds, stricken under water, and put out of their pain; and withal so huge a fire and such tearing of the ordnance of the great Philip, and the rest, when the fire came to them, as if any man had a desire to see hell itself, it was there most lively figured. We spared the lives of all after the victory; but the Flemings, who did little or nothing in the fight, used merciless slaughter, till they were beaten off by myself, and afterwards by the Lord Admiral.'

This is Raleigh's account, and in the main is confirmed by other English and Spanish eyewitnesses. Medina Sidonia, writing from Puerto Real to the King, says that the engagement lasted four hours, and that the galleons went aground by accident, as they were trying to retire further up the harbour, and this is most likely what happened. The channel, as has been observed, is very narrow, and doubtless Sotomayor would have liked to lure the English out of it on to the mud.

By the early afternoon the bay of Cadiz was won. Such of the smaller Spanish ships as had escaped destruction were taken up towards Puerto Real, burning all the merchant vessels they came across, to prevent them from falling into the hands of the English. Soon the Spanish crews got out of hand. All discipline was lost; pillage and flight alone occupied their minds, and all thought of further naval defence was abandoned. In the meanwhile the English troops were rapidly landed to attack the town. The Spanish regular garrison was a very small one, only 150 men, but there were 5000 armed citizens fit for fighting, and a body of 600 or 800 horsemen had ridden over from Jerez to their aid. Essex was the first to land, and Raleigh, though badly wounded in the leg, insisted upon being carried ashore, and so quickly were the boat-loads of eager Englishmen landed and drawn up, that by the time the cavaliers from Jerez could muster, Essex's force was too strong to be repulsed. One charge was attempted, but a volley of musketry put the Spanish horsemen to flight. Pell-mell back to the city they fled. The citizens, in a panic, were afraid to open the gates to them, for the English followed them hotly. The horses were abandoned, and the men scaled the outer glacis at a point where the walls were crumbling and could be surmounted. If the Spaniards could surmount them, so could the English lads who were pressing in pursuit, and soon thousands of Essex's troops were swarming and tumbling over the defences into the town. The townspeople, such of them as had not taken refuge in the citadel, were panic-stricken. A little desultory fighting in the streets from the flat roofs of the houses and a last tussel in the market-place, and Cadiz was at the mercy of Essex and his men. As soon as the fighting ceased, the Lord Admiral and all the principal officers, with Raleigh borne in his litter, entered the market-place, preceded by Sir Edward Hoby, bearing the standard of England, to receive with Essex the capitulation of the city. Submission, complete and abject, was given by the inhabitants. Forty hostages were sent on board the ships to secure the payment of 120,000 crowns ransom for the lives of the people, which ransom was never paid, and the poor hostages were taken to England. All the rich merchandise in the town, with 40,000 ducats in cash, were to be spoil of war, and the inhabitants were to evacuate the place with only the clothes on their back, 'in order that the sacking might be the more complete.' The authorities of the city were paralysed. Poor Medina Sidonia could only wail to far-off Philip of the completeness of the catastrophe. 'Nor ships, nor fleet, nor Cadiz remains,' he wrote. All Andalucia was in danger. There were only 800 men, some without arms, in Port St Mary's. 'I have 3000 countrymen in Jerez,' wrote the Duke, 'but I have no arms for them. . . . This is shameful! I said how necessary it was to send me men and money, and I have not even received an answer from Your Majesty, so I am at my wit's end now, and can only await Your Majesty's orders.' To this had Philip's life-long attempt to rule the world from a writing-table reduced the boasted naval supremacy of Spain. Almost the only man in Cadiz who was equal to an emergency was the Jesuit Father Quesada. He organised the exodus of women and children from the doomed city, clamoured successfully to the victors for food, help and protection for the nuns and women who were shelterless and starving. Food they could not have, for the victors themselves were well nigh famished, but all else that brave men could do to help the innocent vanquished was done by Essex and his men. The Spaniards themselves bore grateful witness to their moderation. The moment resistance ceased, slaughter also ceased. No woman was molested, no personal insult offered. For two days the citadel held out, its inhabitants living on water alone. The obsolete old guns burst at the second or third discharge; help, the defenders knew, could not reach them, and then they gave in. For sixteen days the city of Cadiz underwent a systematic sack. Father Quesada had aided to conceal the valuables of a few churches and private citizens, but apart from that, everything destructible was destroyed, even to the gratings before the windows, and then the city and its cathedrals were burnt, all of them that the flames would consume.

As soon as the city had capitulated on the night of the 20th June, Raleigh, suffering agony from his wound, was carried on board the Warsprite. He knew that once the men were allowed to fall to pillage, then all hope of the capture of the rich Indian fleet up the harbour at Puerto Real was gone, and by daybreak the next morning he sent his brother, Sir John Gilbert, and Lady Raleigh's brother, Sir Arthur Throgmorton, ashore, to beg the commanders for permission to take his squadron up to Puerto Real and secure the rich booty—a booty so rich that it might have induced the Queen to smile upon his plea for Guiana. But the confusion of plunder had already begun and the two commanders hesitated; for the English ships were well nigh abandoned, and they were not sure of the force that might yet be brought against them. Whilst they were hesitating, the opportunity slipped away. In the afternoon the representatives of the Seville merchants came and offered a ransom of 2,000,000 ducats for the fleet, which was refused. ‘We came,’ said the Lord Admiral, ‘to consume, not to compound.’ Raleigh would have been willing enough to compound for a great ransom, but he thought they would get better terms if they secured the ships first, before they were burnt by the Spaniards themselves. Essex, for his part, was for capturing Puerto Real and the ships with his soldiers, for he was no lover of the sea or sailors. Before they could make up their minds, Medina Sidonia, with the energy of despair, ordered every Spanish ship to be burnt. Such rich merchandise as could be carried ashore was hurriedly rescued; and then the great Indian fleet of forty ships, galleons, frigates, argosies and emigrant ships for Guiana, over fifty sail in all, were soon a mass of blazing ruin.

Raleigh was discontented, of course, with his share of the plunder of Cadiz. Les absents ont toujours tort,

and his wound kept him prisoner on board of his ship. 'Some' (i.e., English officers) 'had for their prisoners 20,000 ducats, some 10,000, besides great houses of merchandise'—whereas, he says, all his share was a lame leg, and poverty and pain.

As a matter of fact, in the official inventory of the spoil made after the return to England, he appears to have received £1769, whilst Vere got £3628, and of the two great galleons, which he himself captured, Raleigh got no share of prize money. As usually happened when the command was divided, there had been jealousy amongst the officers from the first; Essex's unjust partiality for the soldiers in the division of the spoil accentuated the differences; and between Vere and Raleigh particularly the bitter feeling continued, though Raleigh's generous tribute to Essex's gallantry and magnanimity in the struggle shows that his great heart could soar above small jealousies.

On the 5th the men were re-embarked on the fleet, and Cadiz was left behind, a heap of ruins. Essex would have retained possession of the place, but cooler heads said no. They knew that the Queen wished to cripple her foe; but to have held a principal port of enemy's country far away from England would have crippled her. They called into the port of Faro, and, amongst other things, looted, and brought to England, the library of the Bishop of the Algarves, Geronimo Osorio, and then sailed for England. Raleigh suffered much from his wound, and a pestilence had broken out on board of his ship. He therefore hastened back to Plymouth in advance of the rest of the fleet, and arrived in England on the 6th August, bringing for the first time authentic details of the action, which had made patent to the world that Spain was impotent and that England was mistress of the sea.

When Drake had sailed into Cadiz harbour and burnt the ships there in 1587, Philip said that it was not the material loss he cared about, but the daring insolence of the action. No attempt on that occasion had been made to land; it was a simple naval coup de main by the greatest sailor afloat. But the sacking of Cadiz in 1596 was a very different matter. Not only was the richest port in Spain captured and pillaged with impunity, but thirteen of the best ships in the Spanish navy, and forty laden Indiamen had been destroyed. There had been hardly an attempt even at organised defence. The Duke of Medina Sidonia could only moan helplessly that he had no money, no arms, no soldiers, and that for months together his letters to the King remained unanswered. Philip, old and broken-hearted, was nearing his grave. Disaster had dogged his leaden footsteps from youth to age; for the rigid unadaptability of his administration, the fatuous belief that he, a man of meditation, could move men of action the world over, like puppets, from his desk, and that events would stand still whilst he was pondering, had brought his country to the last stage of destitution and impotence. The invincible Armada had succumbed to the incompetence of its leader and the hazard of the winds; the attempt had been a great one, and the loss was not irreparable. But the catastrophe of Cadiz showed to what an extent the country had declined in the intervening eight years. Dry rot had entered into the heart of the nation; its virility had been drained; its vigour was gone, and the sceptre of the sea had slipped from its nerveless grasp. The truth that Raleigh had been dinning into the ears of his countrymen for years was patent now to all the world. English ships and English seamen were more than a match for all the Spaniards afloat.

CHAPTER X

THE EXPEDITION TO THE AZORES UNDER ESSEX—DISGRACE OF ESSEX—RALEGH'S ACTION WITH REGARD TO ESSEX—ROBERT CECIL AND ESSEX
—EXECUTION OF ESSEX—CECIL AND RALEGH

RALEGH and Essex arrived in London at about the same time, but only the latter was admitted to see the Queen. The populace had once more been stirred by the stories of the sack of Cadiz, and those who took part in it, particularly Essex, were made popular heroes. An enormous amount of unregistered booty had fallen into the hands of officers and men of all ranks, and tales were rife through London of the plate and jewels, the bags of doubloons, the silks, the velvets, and the costly tapestry hangings, that had been brought home surreptitiously. This was exactly what the Queen had foretold when she objected to the capture of any Spanish towns, and she gave full rein to her greed and ill-humour when she saw her prediction had come true. At least, she could claim all the hostages, and the two galleons brought home. With regard to the first she had a long and undignified squabble with Essex, in which, she was, of course, finally victorious ; and with regard to the prize money for the galleons also she had her way, though greatly to the indignation of the Lord Admiral and the rest of the officers whose claims were thus set aside. She did not scruple to apply the epithets of 'coward' and 'miscreant' to her great minister Burghley, the Lord Treasurer, who ventured to remonstrate with her on the subject.

Though Raleigh, in his despondent fashion, complained that his only reward had been pain and penury and a lame leg, he had the satisfaction in a few months of once more being allowed to bask in the smiles of the goddess, from whose side he had been banished since his marriage five years before. His praise of Essex and the reconciliation between the latter and Sir Robert Cecil, no doubt, greatly pleased the Queen, though she continued to affect displeasure with her young favourite about the booty of Cadiz ; and the squabbles and reconciliations between them were ceaseless. Though he had somewhat sulkily made friends with him, it is certain that Essex himself was not anxious for Raleigh to be taken into full favour again. During May 1597 Raleigh was daily about the Court, and at last, on the 1st June, when Essex had gone to Chatham to be out of the way, Sir Robert Cecil brought Sir Walter into the Queen's presence. She received him graciously, and gave him permission once more to perform his duties as Captain of the Guard. He lost no time ; it had all been arranged beforehand ; he filled up the vacant places in the ranks, once more donning his splendid uniform and silver armour, that same evening he rode by the Queen's side, and thenceforward had the entrance to the privy chamber, as in the days of his highest favour. From his first appearance at Court, Essex had bitterly opposed the Cecils ; and after Walsingham's death had persistently urged the Queen to give the post of Secretary of State to that cruelly ill-used man William Davison or to Sir Thomas Bodley. The aged Lord Burghley was determined that the office should fall to his favourite second son Robert Cecil, and during the absence of Essex at Cadiz, Cecil had been appointed. On the return of the young favourite to Court he found the new Secretary all smiles and cordiality, and for months Raleigh, Essex and Cecil were apparently the best of friends. Cecil was a man who was determined to swim, let who would sink. His own keen self-seeking was seconded by the vast experience and great intellect of his father ; and it is in the highest degree improbable that his new friendship for Essex, who had always opposed him, had any other object but his own advantage. The pride and obstinacy of the young favourite were deeply resented by the Queen herself, as were his constant and turbulent attempts to drag her into acts of aggression against Spain. The Cecils had always advocated a policy of moderation, the triumphant policy which had enabled Elizabeth for nearly forty years to bleed her enemy to exhaustion, without once bringing upon her country the united opposition of all the Catholic powers. If Robert Cecil now turned round and did his best to fan Essex's warlike ardour, we may be sure that he did not do so for the advantage of Essex. How far Cecil's friendship for Raleigh, who had always been on his side, was sincere, we shall have occasion to consider later, but Raleigh, at least, had reason to question it; and we shall be doing no violent injustice to Cecil's memory if we conclude that the one person intended to be benefited was Robert Cecil himself. Certain it is, that everything that the new Secretary could do to urge upon Essex fresh warlike adventure which should keep him away from Court, and incur expenditure, without return to the Queen, was done. When, therefore, rumours reached England that the King of Spain would make a supreme effort to revenge the insult of Cadiz, both Raleigh and Essex were encouraged in their proposal for once more anticipating the possible blow by striking at Philip's own dominions. We know now that the Spanish King was utterly unable to fit out an expedition to attack England, except in the form of some quite inadequate aid to the Irish rebels; and probably Cecil was fully aware of this at the time, but public opinion was excited and had no means of gauging exactly the depth of Philip's purse. Raleigh wrote a discourse at the time, called Opinion upon the Spanish Alarum, in which he expressed his incredulity of the probability of an attack in force from Spain, but still advocated the advisability of being prepared for the worst, by providing for the defence of the coasts. A fleet of ten ships of war was hastily put into commission, but as the news came of the great preparations being made at Ferrol by the Adelantado of Castile to invade Ireland, the fleet was increased to twenty sail of the Queen's ships, with a large number of victuallers, and ten Dutch men-of-war. Probably no one in England knew then, as we know now, that the Adelantado was wearing his heart out in despair at his inability to get a fit force together, even to help the Irish Catholics. Hopeless muddle and confusion reigned supreme at Ferrol and Corunna. Money, men, arms, ammunition and ships were all lacking; corruption, ineptitude and impotence were everywhere; whilst the King, far away in his cell, wrote letters by the hundred about petty details, and insisted upon the sending to him of reports, and ever more reports, each one more bombastic than the last, until the bluff Adelantado blurted out the truth. There was no more real danger to England from Philip now; only England did not know it. It was decided that the English fleet of about 120 sail in all, with 5000 soldiers on board, should sail for Galicia, and, if possible, destroy the Adelantado's fleet. The Lord Admiral was ill and sulky at the Queen's conduct about the Cadiz plunder, and declined the command, which was given to Essex, with Lord Thomas Howard and Raleigh, as his Vice and Rear Admirals respectively. Lord Mountjoy was under Essex to command the troops, much to the envy of Vere, who fell out with his patron and chief about it, and swore never again to serve under him.

The expedition sailed from Plymouth on the 19th July, but was scattered and driven back by a storm in the Bay of Biscay in much suffering and danger, and for the next month it was held wind-bound. In the meanwhile, sickness broke out, provisions went bad, and discontent became rife. Essex and Raleigh posted together from Plymouth to London, and the former used all his persuasions with the Queen to be allowed to proceed as soon as his ships were refitted and the wind served. The season was advanced, however, the enemy on the alert, and the Queen refused to have her ships and men exposed to risk. Only after much hesitation she consented to some fire-ships being sent into Ferrol harbour, with the two captured Spanish galleons from Cadiz and some merchantmen, to burn the Spanish fleet; but on no account was any attempt to be made upon land, for the English troops were to be left in England, and, above all, Essex was made to promise that he would remain with the Queen's ships outside, and take no personal part in the operations. The daring task was entrusted to Raleigh. During his absence in London his famous ship the Roebuck ran aground at Plymouth and was disabled, with other vessels, and when finally, on the 17th August, the fleet sailed, without the troops, it was much smaller than had originally been intended. Once more they were caught in a furious westerly gale in the Bay of Biscay, and both of the captured Spanish galleons were disabled, the San Mateo finding her way back to England. The easterly wind, that finally enabled them to get out of the bay, prevented them from approaching Ferrol, and they were driven towards the south, along the coast of Portugal. All the country was aroused by this time, for Essex imprudently kept near enough to the coast to be seen, and the loss of the San Mateo had convinced the officers that the attempt on Ferrol must be abandoned. Raleigh's ship, the Warsprite, broke her main yard-arm, and was delayed for two days; he and the rest of his squadron with the Dutch soldiers on board went astray from the fleet; and then a series of misunderstandings kept him waiting off the coast of Portugal, whilst Essex and the main body sailed for the Azores for the purpose of intercepting the homeward bound Indian fleet. Raleigh's enemies tried to persuade Essex that he had wilfully deserted and left him in the lurch; but to Essex's credit he refused to listen to the slander, and told Raleigh that he knew it came 'from their cankered and scandalous disposition.' At length, greatly to the joy of Essex, who for several days had been lying off Flores, the scene of the memorable fight of the Revenge, Raleigh and his ships joined him, and the fleet was re-united. False information had been conveyed to them that the Adelantado's fleet had slipped out of Ferrol, and had sailed for the Azores to escort the Indiamen; but they found now that they had been deceived, and it was proposed to attack and lay waste the various islands, which were the principal rendezvous for the Spanish flotillas; and after they had successfully dealt with the smaller islands in separate squadrons to re-unite and attack Terceira, which was notoriously disaffected to the Spanish garrison. Whilst Raleigh and several officers of his squadron were making an excursion in the interior of Flores, and his men were busy watering the ships, he suddenly received a message from Essex that he was immediately sailing to attack Fayal, and that Raleigh and his ships were to join them there without loss of time. Raleigh hurried after his chief, and arrived off Fayal the next morning, but could see nothing of Essex. They found the town in a position of defence, the non-combatants and valuables being hastily sent into the interior, the forts fully manned, and the beach lined with soldiers to dispute a landing. Without waiting for hostilities from Raleigh, they opened fire upon him, though they did him but little damage. This was more than English human nature could well stand, and the men on board became clamorous to attack the island. It was clear, if they were to get any return for the voyage at all, this was their chance, for the main object of the expedition had evidently been frustrated. But still Essex came not, and Raleigh hesitated to act without his chief's orders. Some of Essex's sycophants, like Sir Gilly Merrick, strongly opposed any action in the absence of the chief commanders. On the fourth day it was decided to land a few boat-loads of men on the north-west of the island, some miles from the town, to obtain water, which they had been unable to do in sufficient quantity at Flores, but a large force of armed islanders occupied trenches on the shore, and defied them to land. Both Raleigh and his men had lost patience at the undignified position they had been occupying for the last three days, and he determined to read the islanders a lesson, 'and either gain our landing or a beating.' He therefore decided to land a force of about 160 sailors and 100 soldiers from his own ships. As he and his little force rowed through his squadron on his way to the shore, his captains shouted to him to take some of the Dutch soldiers with him, as his force was too small. He replied that he did not know for what service the Commander-in-chief intended them, and therefore only took sailors and his own men. Fully double the number of enemies awaited them on the beach, and the landing-place had been fortified by two long trenches, which enfiladed a narrow passage by which the assailants had to pass. Raleigh's force ran in rapidly, under the protection of some artillery which he had brought on two pinnaces, but at the landing-place his men blenched. He scornfully shouted a rebuke to them, and caused his own barge to be rowed full upon the rocky beach. He and the gentlemen led the way, breast high in the surf, under a heavy fire, and successfully stormed the trenches. Panic seized the defenders, who fled in confusion, throwing away their arms and seeking refuge in the woods. Some of Raleigh's men were killed, more were drowned, and two of his long boats were sunk; but his loss was a small one considering the end effected. Drawing now a larger force from his ships, he advanced 500 strong to attack the chief town, Villa Dorta, four miles off; Raleigh himself leading, wearing no armour but a gorget. The place was defended by a fort, which received them warmly, and the Dutchmen seemed inclined to waver. Raleigh and his 40 gentlemen marched on 250 yards ahead, scaled the slope, and then, seeing the Dutchmen slowly straggling up, he called out to know whether 'this was the manner of Low Country troops, to show such base cowardice at the first sight of the enemy?' The fort was soon abandoned by the defenders, but another fort on the summit of a high rocky hill still existed. Raleigh found none of his men willing to reconnoitre this place, and indignantly undertook to do so himself and alone. His cousin, Sir Arthur

Gorges, and about 10 of his personal followers insisted upon accompanying him, and the undaunted dozen toiled up the hill, full in face of the enemy's fire, Raleigh wearing a white scarf, and Gorges a red one. Raleigh's garments were pierced by bullets in three places, Gorges got a shot through his leg, two of the men were killed outright, and several more wounded; but before a regular attack of the fort could be made, the defenders fled, and the town itself was also found deserted. He was thus master of the whole island, with a loss of 10 men killed and 20 wounded; and the lesson which he deduces from the action in an episodic reference to it in the History of the World is that a country cannot prevent an enemy's fleet from landing its army without as good a fleet to oppose it, a lesson he was never tired of pressing upon his countrymen. The next morning, September 22nd, Essex and his fleet came into the harbour, and the Commander-in-chief was hotly indignant that his subordinate had robbed him of the glory of taking Fayal. Some of the 'cankered and scandalous' sycophants, who surrounded him, urged him to bring Raleigh to a court-martial, and said that he deserved to lose his head. When Raleigh paid his formal visit to Essex to report his proceedings, he was at once charged with a 'breach of order and the articles.' 'I know of no such breach,' replied Raleigh; and when Essex pointed out that by the instructions no troops were to be landed without the General's order, Raleigh entered into a dignified defence of his action, asserting that the words, 'or other principal commander,' included himself, and allowed him discretion in such case. Essex was not implacable. He knew how much greater was Raleigh's experience and ability as a commander than his own, but Blount and Merrick kept the wound open, and it required all Lord Thomas Howard's diplomacy to prevent Raleigh from being punished and disgraced. Essex and his men, after much hesitation, then attacked Villa Franca in St Michael's, and captured the place, Raleigh's squadron being kept on the other side of the island until the whole of the booty had been secured and shipped, in order that he and his men should have no share of it. Whilst this was passing in the Azores, the Adelantado had managed to get together a fleet of a sort, and early in October it sailed for Ireland, only to be scattered by a storm before reaching the Lizard, and to be driven back disabled to Spain.

Essex remained at sea for a month longer way-laying and capturing Spanish ships. He managed to miss the main body of Indiamen, but took or burnt such stragglers as he came across, and finally returned to England at the end of the month with three rich carracks, and a few merchantmen from Brazil. The booty was not imposing, hardly covering, indeed, the cost of the expedition, and the Queen was accordingly discontented. Essex was received coldly, and found in his absence that he had lost ground at Court. The Lord Admiral had been made Earl of Nottingham for his services at Cadiz, and had been given precedence over all other noblemen of his rank, and this made the foolish, headstrong young Earl more insolent and presumptuous than ever. He insulted and challenged the Lord Admiral and his sons, feigned illness, and deprived the Queen of his company, until at last she relented, and for the sake of peace—it is said at the instance of Raleigh—made Essex Earl Marshal, with precedence next after Howard, who then in his turn took umbrage and retired from Court. On the other hand, the Queen had received Raleigh with marked favour, and approved of his action at Fayal. Raleigh had never been popular with the crowd, but his new favour with the Queen, to the apparent detriment of Essex, made him more than ever disliked; and as soon as might be, he retired to peaceful Sherborne to rest and recruit his broken health. He was soon busy again on the fortifications of the Cornish coast and in other duties of his offices, as well as in Parliament; and thenceforward for a time the rivalry between him and Essex slumbered. But Essex was rushing upon his destruction. His insolence to the Queen was unrestrained. He sought to interfere with State appointments with which he had no concern, until at last the appointment of a new Viceroy in Ireland brought matters to a crisis, and his boorish rudeness to his benefactress, and the famous box on the ears he got from the outraged Queen, laid the foundation of his ruin. After a time, with sulky lip-submission, he came back to Court, ready to quarrel with anyone. His temper at the time is well shown by his treatment of Raleigh at a tourney in the tiltyard at Whitehall on the Queen's birthday, 1598. It appears that Essex learnt of Raleigh's intention of appearing with his train, wearing orange-coloured plumes in their hats, and orange favours. Essex thereupon dressed himself and all his enormous following in the same colours, so as to appear to absorb Raleigh and his smaller suite. This was petty enough; but it was by such acts as this that Essex kept the Court in a turmoil of jealousy and distrust. He had opposed Cecil and the Queen in their intended Irish policy. The English troops had suffered a serious disaster at the hands of Tyrone's rebels, and vigorous action was absolutely necessary, in the face of the intimate relationship which was known to exist between the Irish insurgents and Spain. Essex factiously opposed everything, until at last the supreme command in Ireland was offered to him. To leave Court, with Cecil and Raleigh unrestrained, was a serious step for him to take, and he hesitated, but he was discontented and unhappy, yearning for opportunities of gaining fresh popular applause, and at last he took the plunge, and assumed the charge that had ruined and broken the heart of his father.

He had no sooner decided to go to Ireland than he regretted the step he had taken. 'From a mind delighting in sorrow,' he wrote to the Queen, 'from spirits wasted with passion, from a heart torn in pieces with care, grief and travail, from a man that hateth himself and all things else that keep him alive, what service can Your Majesty expect, since any service past deserves no more than banishment and proscription to the cursedest of islands? It is your rebel's pride and succession must give me leave to ransom myself out of this hateful prison, out of my loathed body, which, if it happeneth so, Your Majesty shall have cause to mislike the fashion of my death, since the course of my life could never please you.'

Soon after his arrival in Ireland he wrote to the Queen in bitter jealousy, 'From England I receive nothing but discomforts and soul's wounds. . . . Is it not lamented of Your Majesty's faithfulest subjects both there and here that a Cobham and Raleigh—I will forbear others for their places' sakes—should have such credit and favour with Your Majesty, when they wish the ill success of Your Majesty's most important action, the decay of your greatest strength, and the destruction of your faithful servants?' For the dastardly suggestion directed against Raleigh—and evidently against Cecil—that they wished for the success of Tyrone is absolutely unfounded. There is no hint of such a thing in the correspondence between the Irish insurgents and the Spaniards, as there would have been if it were true ; but there is a statement made by Tyrone and O'Donnell that Essex himself was in negotiation with them for joining forces and holding Ireland until he could have his own way in England. The Irish chiefs asserted that it was only Essex's distrust as to their good faith that prevented him from joining them. Sir Christopher Blount, who was executed for complicity in Essex's conspiracy, said that whilst the Earl was in Ireland he consulted him, Blount, as to bringing in 4000 Queen's soldiers then under his (Blount's) command, 'with full purpose to right himself by force of such wrongs as he complained he had received here in his absence.' Blount on the scaffold asserted that Essex would have raised the standard of revolt in Ireland, but for the persuasion to the contrary of the Earl of Southampton and himself. Moreover, at the time, Essex was certainly carrying on a secret correspondence with James VI., with the alleged purpose of counteracting the supposed acquiescence of Cecil and Raleigh in plots in favour of the succession of the Infanta ; and subsequent to Essex's return to England and disgrace with the Queen, his friend, Lord Mountjoy, then about to start for Ireland as Essex's successor, wrote to James, proposing that a Scottish army should be placed on the borders, to compel the Queen to acknowledge James as her heir, whilst Essex raised the standard in England, and Mountjoy himself brought over half the Queen's army from Ireland to join him ; and thus to overawe Elizabeth and her Government for the benefit of Essex and James. Accusations, therefore, brought by such men as these against Raleigh and Cecil must be scrutinised very closely before being accepted. We shall consider in due course what connection, if any, Raleigh had with the Infanta's party at a later stage, but it is certain that up to this time he had no share whatever in it, notwithstanding the hints of Essex and his friends.

Essex began badly in Ireland by dallying in Munster, when he should have been striking swiftly and heavily at Tyrone and O'Donnell. He offended the Queen by appointing his friend Southampton to an important command, after Her Majesty had positively forbidden such an appointment. He then made a bad matter worse by refusing to dismiss Southampton; and his friends at Court told him that the Queen was looking upon his proceedings as traitorous. He next took the fatal step of rushing over to England, abandoning his high post, and, all travel-stained as he was, pushed his way into the Queen's bedroom at Nonsuch, and knelt at his Sovereign's feet. Soon the Court was ostentatiously divided into two factions. Essex was under arrest and, so to speak, upon his trial for disobedience, and was supported by the Earls of Worcester and Rutland, Lords Mountjoy, Rich, Lumley and Henry Howard, at least three of whom are known to have belonged to the Spanish Catholic party; whilst Cecil had on his side Raleigh, the Earls of Shrewsbury and Nottingham, Lords Thomas Howard, Cobham, Grey, and Raleigh's cousin Sir George Carew. The danger grew; the crowd was on the side of Essex, and large numbers of officers flocked over from Ireland to stand by the side of the popular Earl, who lost no opportunity of posing in the eyes of the people as the victim of Cecil and Raleigh's jealous intrigues, instead of his own folly and wrong-headedness. It was during this period of mutual hatred and distrust (the early summer of 1600) that Raleigh wrote his famous letter to Cecil, which has so frequently been interpreted to the writer's prejudice. It may be explained that Cecil had shown no disposition to push matters to an extreme against Essex, and had caused the Queen to remove his case from the Star Chamber, where the punishment would have been confiscation and perpetual imprisonment, to the Council itself, where a milder course would be taken.

The following are Raleigh's words to the Secretary :—

‘I am not wise enough to geve yow advise; butt if yow take it for good counsell to relent towards this tirant, yow will repent it when it shalbe too late. His mallice is fixt, and will not evaporate by any of your mild courses. For he will ascribe the alteration to Her Majesty's pusillanimitye, and not to your good nature; knowing that yow worke but uppon her humour, and not out of any love towards hyme.

The less yow make hyme, the less he shalbe able to harm yow and yours. And if Her Majesty's favour faile hyme hee will againe decline to a common person. For after - revenges, feare them not; for your own father, that was esteemed to be the contriver of Norfolk's ruin, yet his son followeth your father's son, and loveth him. Humours of men succeed not butt grow by occasions and accidents of time and power. . . . I could name yow a thousand of thos; and therfore after-fears are but profesies—or rather conjectures from cawses remote. Looke to the present and yow do wisely. His son shalbe the youngest Earle of England but one, and if his father be kept down, Will Cecil shalbe abell to keip as many men at his heeles as hee, and more too. . . . But if the father continue, he wilbe abel to break the branches, and pull up the tree, root and all. Lose not your advantage; if you do, I rede your destiny.—Your's to the end,

W. R.'

On the margin is written, 'Lett the Q. hold Bothwell while she hath hyme. He will ever be the canker of her estate and saufty. Princes are lost by security; and preserved by prevention. I have seen the last of her good days and all ours, after his libertye.'

Most of Raleigh's biographers have considered it necessary to offer some apology for this bitter letter. I do not think that any such is required. Essex was clearly now a standing danger to the State. Some of the best heads of England had fallen for less than a tithe of his offences, and with the views of the times it was the most natural thing in the world that Raleigh, to whom his triumph would have meant ruin—probably death—should have urged that the usual punishment for treason should be awarded him, or at least, that the leniency of Cecil should not shield him from it. What Raleigh did not know, but was to find out later to his heavy cost, was that the cool, unemotional hunchback Cecil was intent upon playing a double game by which in any case he would win. He knew, of course, that Essex was posing to James as the supporter of his claims to the succession, and saw that leniency to the Earl would be well regarded by the man who might probably become his sovereign. Cecil took care a little later himself to convince James that he was his strongest partisan, but was determined that his friend and colleague Raleigh should have no part in the King's good will.

Whilst Essex was chafing in disgrace, Raleigh was advancing in power and favour. The new King of Spain was forced to recognise the fact that his country was well nigh bankrupt and impotent; and peace both with France and England was in the air. English commissioners were sent to Boulogne, but for the time the negotiations came to nothing, so far as England was concerned. During the course of the conferences, however, it became necessary to send a secret mission to Maurice of Nassau, still engaged in trying to relieve Ostend, with many English sym-pathisers by his side. The Queen had peremptorily refused to appoint Essex one of the commissioners for peace, but, as if to emphasise her displeasure with him, she entrusted Raleigh and Lord Cobham with the mission to Prince Maurice, and on Raleigh's return appointed him Governor of Jersey. Essex was now at liberty, but out of favour with the Queen, to whom he grew more and more insolent; telling her on one occasion, according to Raleigh, 'that her disposition was as crooked as her carcass.' He wrote to James alarming letters about Raleigh's unrestrained power in the west country, and now in Jersey. Lord Cobham, too, was Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, and the Cecil party was in possession of all the principal outlets to the kingdom where a Spanish force might land. The government of the country, Essex assured James, was now in the hands of a party who would sell it to the Infanta the moment the breath was out of the Queen's body; and although he knew it was untrue, Essex pretended to believe that he had been marked out by Raleigh and Cobham as the first person to be destroyed. It was an absolute fiction that either Cecil or Raleigh was in negotiation with the Infanta's party, but Essex knew that no more unpopular charge could be brought against them, and sheltered his own ambitions and grievances behind it. There is no doubt that Essex's conspiracy was far more widespread than it was considered wise to bring out at his trial, and that James himself was deeply implicated in it, as well as many important persons in England. At length matters came to a crisis. Essex had been feigning contrition at his house in the country, until he found the Queen was obdurate, and that the Cecil party had a firm grasp of power. Then he returned ostentatiously to Essex House, and began to show open disaffection. Sumptuous entertainments were given to his friends; the extreme Puritan party was made much of, and the populace conciliated by denunciations of Spain and the Catholics. Secret conferences were held at Drury House (Sir John Danvers's), on the other side of the Strand, to divert suspicion from Essex House, and a plot was formed for seizing Whitehall, and forcing the Queen to dismiss Cecil, Raleigh, the Lord Admiral, and the rest of them, and then summon Parliament and settle the question of the succession. Cecil had his spies everywhere, and knew all about the silly plan. Essex was summoned before the Council on Saturday, 7th February 1601, and declined to attend on the ground of illness. It was clear that the time for action had come, but the plan of seizing Whitehall was evidently impracticable now, for the Government was on the alert, and the guards had been doubled. Early on Sunday morning Essex's friends, Southampton, Monteagle, Sandys, Rutland, and 300 gentlemen, met at Essex House with the intention of riding into the city hard by, and arousing the citizens with the recital of the popular Earl's supposed wrongs, and his danger from Raleigh, of whom the populace were willing to believe any slander. Whilst they were assembled Raleigh sent a message to one of them—a connection of his own—Sir Ferdinando Gorges, to come and see him at Durham House. Essex consented to his going, if he met Raleigh on the river but did not enter his house. Raleigh was alone in his boat when they met, and advised Gorges to escape to Plymouth, as a warrant was out for him. Gorges said it was now too late, and that he had gone too far to draw back. Raleigh then asked what was the matter. ‘I told him there were 2000 gentlemen who had resolved that day to live or die free men.’ To this Raleigh replied that he did not see what they could do against the Queen’s authority. ‘It is the abuse of that authority by you and others,’ said Gorges, ‘which made so many honest men seek a reformation,’ whereupon Raleigh sternly told him to remember his allegiance and his duty, and returned to Court; whilst Gorges rejoined the conspirators at Essex House. Sir Christopher Blount had—according to Gorges—advised him to kill Raleigh during the interview on the river, but he refused to do so, although he confesses that one of his reasons for his not doing so was to establish a claim upon Raleigh’s gratitude in case of failure. Blount himself, however, was less scrupulous, and sent four men with muskets to follow Gorges, and, if possible, to murder Raleigh, for which on the scaffold he begged the latter’s forgiveness. A commission of the Council was sent to Essex House, to warn those assembled on their allegiance to disperse. The members of the commission were shut up in the house, and the infatuated Earl rode through Temple Bar with his retinue, crying out that Raleigh had laid an ambuscade for him on his way to Whitehall, and sought his life. The church-going citizens flocked around him open-mouthed and listened, but made no move in his favour. To sympathise with a brilliant, open-handed, popular favourite in disgrace was one thing, but to take up arms against the State for his private grievances was another, and soon murmurs of 'treason' in the crowd warned Essex that he had made a mistake. He sought to ride back to Essex House, but he found the city train-band had blocked his way and Temple Bar was shut. Galloping down one of the side lanes off Fleet Street, he cast himself into a boat and rowed back to his house, only to find it besieged on the Strand front, and shortly afterwards beleaguered by water. After a siege of a few hours, he surrendered at discretion, and ten days afterwards was tried and condemned for high treason. The principal conspirators, Essex amongst them, vied with each other in the frankness and thoroughness of their confessions, though they all tried to throw the principal blame upon others, but Blount absolved Raleigh from the accusation of a design to kill Essex, which he said was only 'a word cast out to colour other matters.' During Essex's trial at Westminster, Raleigh was on duty as captain of the guard, and also gave evidence as to his conversation with Gorges on the river. When Raleigh was called, Essex, insolent to the last, cried, 'What booteth it to swear this fox'; and, at a subsequent stage, the Earl sought to justify his statement that Cecil and Raleigh were arranging to sell the country to the Infanta, by alleging that he had been told that Cecil had said to a fellow-councillor that the Infanta's title was as good as that of any other person. Cecil immediately challenged him to prove it, whereupon he appealed to poor weak Southampton, who stood by his side in the dock, who, in his turn, named Sir William Knollys. Before the trial was allowed to proceed Knollys was sent for, and as he stepped on to the witness-stand the fate of Essex trembled in the balance. 'Did Mr Secretary ever use any such speeches in your hearing or to your knowledge?' was the question asked. 'I never heard him speak any words to that effect,' answered Knollys, and the words must have sounded like a death knell to the doomed man, enmeshed in the toils he had spun for others. At Essex's execution, Raleigh, as captain of the guard, was present in the Tower. He thought that perchance the Earl might wish to speak to him, or ask his forgiveness in his last moments, and at first took up a position near the scaffold; but the populace, who hated Raleigh, and had made up its mind that Essex was being sacrificed to his intrigues, began to murmur, and Raleigh retired to a distant window of the armoury where he could see without being seen. He afterwards said he was sorry that he had done so, as the Earl had asked for him. The cruel slanders about his indecent rejoicing at the fall of his rival rest upon an utterly discredited foundation—the imagination of the prejudiced crowd and the statements of the vile scoundrel Stukeley, who afterwards betrayed Raleigh. In his own last moments on the scaffold, Raleigh indignantly repudiated the slander. ‘True it was, I was of the contrary faction, but I bare him no ill affection, and always believed it had been better for me that his life had been preserved; for after his fall I got the hatred of those who wished me well before, and those who set me against him set themselves afterwards against me, and were my greatest enemies.’

We are told that Raleigh was sad and troubled on his way back to Durham House, after Essex’s execution, and well he might be. He was now supreme favourite, with no one to come between him and the Queen. But Elizabeth herself was a setting sun, and the great problem for courtiers was what luminary was to come after her. Essex had been brought to ruin by his own folly, but his descent had been carefully aided by Cecil for years past; and yet Cecil now posed, both to James VI. and to the London mob, as a man deeply injured by Essex, but who had sought to soften the blow which had fallen on the favourite;

whilst Raleigh was, by his own writing to Cecil, made to appear a vindictive enemy, urging the Secretary to extreme courses. Before very long Raleigh was to find, when too late, that Robert Cecil could as ill brook the rivalry of friends and partisans like himself, as that of declared opponents like Essex. Hardly had the head of the Earl been struck from his shoulders than the secret correspondence which was to ruin Raleigh was commenced between Secretary Cecil, Lord Henry Howard and the coming King James.

Raleigh's multifarious duties did not sit lightly upon him : he worked laboriously at them all. As Governor of Jersey, planning new fortifications, sitting as supreme judge in litigious cases, or abolishing old abuses ; as Lord Warden of the Stannaries, safeguarding the interests of his tin miners, whilst securing his own great revenues ; as Lord Lieutenant of Cornwall, keeping an eye on the important fortresses upon which the safety of England so largely depended ; as Captain of the Guard and informal councillor, in constant attendance upon the Queen and entertaining foreign diplomatists ; as a great Irish landowner—a quality he was soon to relinquish by the sale of his estate—immersed in litigation with his neighbours and tenants ; as an English country gentleman, deeply interested in the cultivation of his lands ; as an explorer, continuing to send expeditions to Guiana at his own expense to maintain the friendly communications with the natives, and striving, again and again, unsuccessfully, to join hands with his abandoned colonists in Virginia; and, above all, as a Parliament man, speaking often and weightily. He sat as senior Knight of the Shire for Cornwall in the Parliament of 1601-2. A bill was introduced for the compulsory sowing of hemp by farmers. To this he was strongly opposed. 'I do not,' he said, 'like this constraining of men to manure or use their ground at our wills; but rather let every man use his ground for that which it is most fit for, and therein use their own discretion'; and he subsequently went on to condemn the compulsory ploughing of land, which he said the farmers often were too poor to sow, and it was thus made useless even for pasture. He also spoke strongly and patriotically in favour of a generous grant being voted for the defence of the country. The Spaniards had established a considerable army at Kinsale, and had been twice unsuccessful in subsequent attempts to send strong fleets to reinforce it. There was some attempt in Parliament to exempt the 'three pound men,' but Raleigh successfully demanded that there should be no exemptions. He let it be seen, however, that his action was not from any want of sympathy for the poorer taxpayers, but only because the required subsidy could not be raised unless the 'three pound men' were included. The way in which he turned upon such powerful men as Cecil and Bacon, both of whom favoured his own view, in this debate, is a good specimen of the intellectual arrogance which drew so much dislike upon him. Cecil had said, 'Neither pots or pans nor dish nor spoon should be spared when danger is at our elbows. I would not by any means have the "three pound men" excluded, because I would have the King of Spain to know how willing we are to sell all in defence of God's religion, our prince and our country.' And Raleigh answered, 'I like it not that the Spaniards, our enemies, should know of our selling our pots and pans to pay subsidies; you may call it policy . . . but I am sure it argues poverty in the State.' Francis Bacon had advocated the inclusion of the 'three pound men' on the ground that 'Dulcis tractus pari jugo.' 'Call you this "par jugum,"' cried Raleigh, 'when a poor man pays as much as a rich one; and peradventure his estate is no better than it is set at, or but little better; while our estates are thirty or forty pounds in the Queen's books, and it is not the hundreth part of our wealth; therefore it is neither dulcis nor par.'

In his speeches during the session in favour of the repeal of the act for compulsory tillage, his arguments are curiously anticipatory of the free trade views which in our times have become established. 'The Low Countryman and the Hollander,' he pointed out, 'who never sow corn, have by their industry such plenty that they may serve other nations . . . and therefore I think the best course is to set it (i.e., the cultivation of corn) at liberty, and leave every man free, which is the desire of a true Englishman.'

By more than one little civil passage of arms between Raleigh and Cecil in this session, it is easy to see that although they were still ostensibly friendly, the division had already begun. Cecil's letters to Raleigh's cousin, Sir George Carew, at the same period tell a similar story. It is evident from them that Cecil stood in the way of Raleigh's constant ambition to be appointed a privy councillor, and that Cecil's path of selfish statesmanship here separated from that of his old friend and colleague.

CHAPTER XI

THE SUCCESSION TO THE CROWN—THE INFANTA'S CLAIM—CECIL, HENRY HOWARD AND JAMES VI.
—RALEGH MARKED OUT FOR DESTRUCTION—
DEATH OF THE QUEEN—DISGRACE OF RALEGH—ARREST OF COBHAM AND RALEGH—ACCUSED OF TREASON

DURING the whole of her reign Elizabeth had vigorously resisted all persuasions to countenance a successor to her crown. By the will of Henry VIII. it devolved upon her death to the descendants of Frances, Duchess of Suffolk, represented at the end of Elizabeth's reign by William Seymour, the grandson of Catharine Grey by the Earl of Hertford, whom she had married in the Tower. James Stuart, as representing the descendants of the elder daughter of Henry VII., Margaret, Queen of Scotland, was held by many jurists to be excluded in consequence of his being an alien; and his cousin Arabella, the daughter of Darnley's younger brother, was considered to have a better claim to the crown. There were several descendants of the Poles, notably the Earl of Huntingdon, who were also considered to have a right to be included in the line of succession, and who, at various times during Elizabeth's life, had been taken up by one or another of the political parties.

Mary Stuart's will, disinheriting her son James in consequence of his heresy and bequeathing her rights to the English crown to Philip of Spain, had been the outcome of long-continued intrigue on the part of Spanish paid agents; but it was only intended to give further sanction to Philip's claim as a descendant of Philippa Plantagenet, daughter of John of Gaunt, which, for some time previously, had been cautiously and tentatively advanced. There had long been a bitter feud between the English and Scottish Catholic exiles with regard to the succession. Most of them were in the pay of Philip; and the English, with a few exceptions, were strongly opposed to the accession of a Scottish king to the English throne. They were ceaseless in urging upon Philip that the union of the two crowns would mean the subjugation of England to Scotland, which the English would never permit; and Philip's English advisers pointed out to him that a Catholic revival, which reached them over the Scottish border, would be resisted on national grounds even by the English Catholics themselves. On the other hand, the Guises, the French cardinals at the Vatican, the Scots, and the Pope himself, who were not anxious to see the Spaniards supreme over England, were in favour of converting James, or, at least, securing from him toleration for Catholics, and helping him to the crown. For years the main intrigue was worked in Rome, where Allen and Parsons, with Philip's ambassador, were ceaseless in their efforts to throw cold water on the suggestion that James might be sincerely converted; whilst Cardinal Mondovi, Cardinal Sanzio, the agent of the League, and, above all, the Carthusian Bishop of Dunblane, were equally active in an opposite direction. The duplicity of James himself was marvellous. He blew hot and cold with equal facility; would enter into Catholic plots with Huntly or Claude Hamilton; would receive and smile upon the Bishops of Ross or Dunblane, discuss religion with the Jesuit priests, ask the Pope and Philip for men and money to protect him against the heretics; or allow Guise to suggest a marriage between him and the Pope's niece. But he was equally ready to receive a pension from Elizabeth; and when it suited him, to be as rigid a Puritan as John Knox himself.

As Elizabeth's days began to draw to an end, it became necessary for English statesmen to consider deeply the subject which she herself avoided. The edifice of English greatness had been laboriously built up during forty years of herculean labour and consummate statesmanship; and it behoved all those who had taken part in the work, to safeguard it when the great Queen should fall. For personal reasons, and from the Queen's policy, most of the English claimants had receded into the background before Elizabeth's death, and Lady Arabella Stuart was the only person in England of royal descent who had any probability of success. She herself was a somewhat unwise and flighty person, who lived principally with her grandmother, the Countess of Shrewsbury — Bess of Hardwick — at one or other of her great houses, Chatsworth or Hardwick Hall. Her life at Court, when she went thither, was an unquiet one; she was alternately patronised and snubbed by the Queen, and as many husbands had been in turn suggested for her by various political combinations as for Elizabeth herself — Leicester's base son, James VI., Henry IV., the Archduke Mathias, and a host of other pretenders, were in turn mentioned and dropped, until, in the last year of the Queen's reign, she took the dangerous step of marrying clandestinely young William Seymour, the grandson of Catharine Grey. The combination thus formed might have been a powerful one, as it united the two principal English claimants; and but for the obscure intrigues which brought Cecil to adopt James VI., it is quite possible that Arabella Stuart and her husband might have succeeded peacefully to the throne. The question of the succession was thus an open one, and it involved no disloyalty on the part of Raleigh, or any other statesman, to examine and discuss the various claims, or to espouse the cause of either of the claimants.

The pamphlets with regard to the right of succession had been numerous. The Scottish-French party had persistently alleged that Mary Stuart and her son were not ineligible for the English throne in consequence of their being aliens; and when the English Catholics had persuaded Philip that the country would welcome him with open arms in place of a Scotsman, and it was determined to assert his own claims, the arguments of the Scottish party were adopted so far as they related to the eligibility of alien princes to succeed. Philip's descent from John of Gaunt was always coupled with the renunciation of Mary Stuart in his favour; and James was excluded by the Spaniards, not for alienage, but in consequence of his mother's will, and because of his heresy, and the kinship of his parents, who had been married without a papal dispensation. At the time of the Armada the Pope had been cajoled into an agreement by which Philip was to have the right of appointing the Sovereign of England when Elizabeth was deposed; but when the Pontiff became restive as to the person to be appointed, he was told that the King did not want England for himself, but that in order to be quite sure of the effectual conversion of the country, the only person he could depend upon would be his daughter the Infanta.

Sixtus did not like the situation, but both he and the French had been disarmed by the clever prior diplomacy of Philip, and he was obliged to put up with it; rejoicing, nevertheless, at its failure when the disaster of the Armada had made it for a time impossible. The English Catholics, however, paid by Philip; Heighinton, Father Parsons (in his own name and under that of Dolman), Dr Wendon, Cardinal Allen and others, continued both in speech and writing to urge the claims of the Spanish King, and even the Scottish Bishop of Ross (Leslie) and the Archbishop of Glasgow (Beton) were ultimately bought over to the same side.

After the failure of the Armada, the English residents in Spain, the Duchess of Feria at their head, begged Philip, again and again, to espouse the cause of the afflicted Catholics in England; the Jesuits were ceaseless in their efforts to the same end; and when it became evident that the King himself was too old and broken to act for himself, he was urged to make provisions for aiding by arms and money the accession of his favourite daughter the Infanta when Elizabeth should die. No prompt action could be got from him, and beyond his tardy and inadequate aid to the Irish rebels, he did little but adopt in principle the prayer of the English exiles that the Infanta should be their future sovereign.

After Philip's death in 1598, the English Catholics continued to urge upon his successor the vigorous promotion of the Infanta's claim. Philip III., however, was even in greater penury than his father had been, utterly exhausted by his disastrous attempts to aid the Irish, and for a time no definite answer could be obtained from him. Father Creswell was representing the English Catholics at Madrid and Father Parsons in Rome, urging upon Philip III. continually the need for a prompt decision, and at length, in July 1600, it was decided that the Infanta and her husband, the Archduke, now Sovereigns of the Netherlands, should be adopted formally as the Spanish candidates for the English throne. It had been decided by Philip and his Council that galleys should be sent to Flanders to be in readiness ; but the King was sadly told that there were no galleys available, and the most that could be done was to send thither 200,000 ducats to hold in readiness for instant use when the Queen of England should die. To Father Parsons in Rome was entrusted the task of conveying the intelligence to the English Catholics, but only those in whom implicit confidence could be placed were to be told.

Late in 1602 Creswell presented to the Council in Madrid communications from the Catholics in England saying that the Queen might die at any moment. James's friends were busy, and it was absolutely necessary, if the Catholics were not to be completely outwitted, that a considerable force should be ready to act in the Infanta's favour when the Queen died. They begged that an immediate answer, yes or no, should be sent to them ; because if nothing was to be done, they must make the best terms they could with the new king. In vain, week after week, Creswell prayed for an answer, until at last he lost patience and threatened to inform his principals that he could do no more, and washed his hands of the business.

The slow and cumbrous methods of infinite consultation introduced by Philip II. always made prompt decision impossible ; but the reason why Creswell was kept waiting from November 1602 to March 1603 for a formal answer as to the Spanish intentions was that when the communications of the English Catholics were laid before the Council, Count de Olivares had the boldness for the first time to seize the bull by the horns, and in a speech of prodigious length and prolixity placed an entirely new light on the matter. What was the good, he asked, of talking about imposing the Infanta on the English people. She and her husband were elderly and childless, neither of them cared a straw about the English throne : they had more than they could do to hold the Netherlands. The King's exchequer was empty ; he had no ships or men to spare ; and to assume an endless responsibility in England would probably complete the ruin of Spain. Let the English Catholics choose one of themselves, or even a heretic if he would give toleration ; and then the King of Spain might assume the disinterested rôle of the champion of the English candidate, to whom he would transfer his rights, against the alien King of Scots. This was a new view, and the Council was ordered to discuss it fully and exhaustively. It took them three months to do it, but it was at last decided that the Infanta was to be dropped, and the English Catholics informed that the King would aid any candidate they adopted. It was thought that this solution would disarm the King of France and the Pope, the latter of whom was to be tackled by Father Parsons and the Duke of Sessa. Ships were to be fitted out and a fresh supply of money sent to Flanders, the selected candidate was to be recommended to conciliate other pretenders by almost dividing the country amongst them, and the Spanish force to be sent was to request the new sovereign to grant the Isle of Wight as a station, which, once gained, the Spaniards had no intention of giving up. But, above all, the Queen's ministers were to be approached, and convinced that Spain had now no selfish views, and that this was the solution which offered the best prospects both for them and for England. This formal decision was arrived at on the 2nd March 1603, and the matter has been set forth thus at length, as it probably furnishes the key to the mystery which has always surrounded Raleigh's alleged complicity in a plot in favour of the Spanish party.

There is little reason to doubt, however, that, although the official decision of the Spanish Council was not adopted until the beginning of March, its drift was known to the English Catholics by the end of the year 1602 or very early in 1603, and that the person selected by them to be aided by Spanish arms was Arabella Stuart, whose close imprisonment at that time may be thus explained. It had been decided, as has been said, to approach Elizabeth's ministers and enlist them in the new Spanish plans, on the patriotic grounds of excluding the alien Scot; and there is no doubt that the communications known to have passed between Cobham and Raleigh and the Flemish envoy Aremberg were originally to this effect.

In the meanwhile Cecil had established a perfect secret understanding with James, from which Raleigh was excluded. Several weeks after Essex's death, James's envoys, the Earl of Mar and Mr Bruce of Kinloss, arrived in London, too late of course to save the Earl; but their second instructions were cautiously to approach Cecil and offer him the King's favour in return for help to his cause. Their fulfilment of these orders was more prudent than the orders themselves, which had conveyed a threat, on the supposition that Cecil was taking part in the Spanish plans, a belief doubtless conveyed to James by Essex. A secret conference with Cecil soon convinced Mar that this was a mistake, and an arrangement was made for the carrying on of a correspondence between the King and the Secretary. Before this, James had been propitiated by Lord Henry Howard, certainly the basest villain in the black story of betrayal that followed. Lord Henry Howard, long afterwards the murderer of Sir Thomas Overbury, had been for many years a spy in the pay of Spain, and was deep in the confidence of the Catholic party. Everything that was done in the interests of the Spanish plans was known to him. At the same time he was carrying on a confidential correspondence with James, in which his hate of Raleigh was indulged in without restraint. Not only was Raleigh blackened, but nearly every other statesman but Cecil, upon whom Howard knew he would have to depend. Northumberland and Cobham especially were attacked, as friends of Raleigh. ‘Hell cannot afford such a like triplicity, that denies the Trinity,’ he wrote to James, speaking of these three. In November 1601, the Duke of Lennox, who had been sent by James to Henry IV. to ask for his countenance to his claims—which, by the way, Henry IV. was not very willing to give—was ordered to hasten to London whilst Parliament was sitting, to watch his master’s interests. He was brought into touch with Raleigh and Cobham, ‘those wicked villains,’ as Howard called them. Several conferences appear to have taken place at Durham House, at which Raleigh expressed his devotion to James—this, be it remembered, was more than a year before the decision of the Spaniards to support any English candidate against James. Anything that should bring Raleigh into friendly contact with the Scottish King was gall and wormwood to Henry Howard, who at once sounded an alarm. First he wrote to the Earl of Mar suggesting that Lennox was busy raising up a party in opposition to Mar and Cecil; and to James he continued to repeat that Raleigh and Cobham were really against him. 'Hell did never vomit up such a couple,' he said.

But the dastardly scoundrel went further, and put in writing the heads of a proposed plot, by which Raleigh and Cobham should be destroyed. It is in the form of a letter to Cecil now in the Cotton MSS. First the Queen's mind must be poisoned against them. 'Hir Majesty must knowe the rage of their discontent for want of being called to that height which they affect; and be made to taste the perill that growes out of discontented minds. . . . She must know that the blame is only laid on hir. . . . So that roundly Hir Majestie must daily and by divers means be let to know the world's apprehendinge hir deepe wisdom in discerning the secret flawes of their affections. She must see some advertisements from forrain parts of the greif which the Queene's enemies doo take at their (i.e., Raleigh and Cobham's) sittinge out, hoping that their placing in authority would so far alienate the people's reverent affection as some mischief would succeed of it. She must be taught to see the perill that growes unto princes, by protecting, countenancing, or entertaining persons odious to the multitude.' One by one the three friends, Raleigh, Cobham and Northumberland, and even Raleigh's wife, are picked to pieces in order that Cecil may show their failings to the Queen. 'Rawlie that in pride exceedeth all men alive, finds no vent for paradoxis out of a Council board . . . and inspireth Cobham with his own passions. His wife as furious as Proserpina with failing of that restitution at Court which flatterie had moved her to expect.' All this and much more was to be instilled into the Queen's ear by Cecil, 'that she may be more apt to receive impressions of more important reasons when time serves with opportunity.' And then, 'you must embark this gallant Cobham by your witt and interest, in some course the Spanish way, as either may reveale his weaknesse or snare his ambition.' 'For my own part, I account it impossible for him to escape the snares which wit may sett and weaknesse is apt to fall into.' Howard says that the two friends had planned that Cobham should advocate peace with Spain, whilst Raleigh opposed it, in order that in either case one would succeed and help the other. Inferences were to be drawn from their desire, and toils set for them that they could not escape, and, as we shall see, into which they fell. Cecil, in his first letters to James, strikes the note of detraction of Raleigh and his friends, which was to deepen until they were ruined. Cecil had been the life-long friend of Raleigh, and their correspondence had been of the most affectionate character, and yet this is how he writes of him when he is asking the King not to convey to him, Cecil, any intelligence of the supposed plots of Raleigh and his friends, in case any accident should happen to the letter and he should lose their confidence.

‘I do profess, in the presence of Him that knoweth and searcheth all men’s hearts, that if I dyd not some tyme cast a stone into the mouth of these gaping crabbs when they are in the prodigall humour of discourses, they would not stick to confess dayly how contrary it is to their nature to resolve to be under your sovereignty, though they confess (Raleigh especially) that rebus sic stantibus, naturall policy forceth him to keep on foot such a trade against the great day of mart. In all which light and sudden humours of his, though I do no way check him becawse he shall not think I reject his freedom or his affection, but alwaies (sub sigillo confessionis) use contestation with him that I neyther had nor ever would in individuo contemplate future idea, nor ever hoped for more than justice in time of change; yet, under pretext of extraordinary care of his well-doing, I have seemed to dissuade him from ingaging himself too farr, even for himself—much more, therefore, to forbear to assume for me or my present intentions.’ This friend then begs the King to believe nothing that Raleigh may say under any circumstances. But why, he asks, should he trouble the King with the relation of Raleigh's 'ingratitude' to him. 'I will leave the best and worst of him to 3 (i.e., Lord Henry Howard) relation, in whose discretion and affection you may sleep securely.' Cecil, too, working on James's known theological bias, revived the old slander about Raleigh's religion, and calls him 'a person whom most religious men do hold anathema.' So jealous were Cecil and Howard, that they went to the length of begging James to tell them the name of the person who had introduced Raleigh to the Duke of Lennox, their evident desire being to mark even the intermediary down for ruin. James himself knew this, for he writes that the gentleman was Sir Arthur Savage, 'a verrie honest, plaine gentleman.' 'Not doubting but that 10 (i.e., Cecil) will conserve this as a freind's secreate, without suffering the gentleman to receave haim thereby — since the gentlemanis nature appearis to be farre different from Raulies.' Through the correspondence, both with Cecil and Howard, James and his ministers, Mar and Bruce, are extravagant in their professions of love and confidence in Cecil, and in their assurances that Raleigh shall not be allowed to supplant him. Raleigh's old friend, Northumberland, must have seen that he was marked out for disgrace, for even he made haste to scuttle away from the sinking ship. In a letter to the King, giving him particulars of the tendencies of the English courtiers towards the succession, he says that although Raleigh is opposed to some of James's friends, yet he knows that he is in favour of the King's claims. 'The first of these (i.e., Cobham) I know not how his heart is affected, but the latter (Raleigh), whom sixteen years' acquaintance hath confirmed to me, I must needs affirme Rawliegh's ever allowance of yowr right; and although I knowe him insolent, extremely heated, a man that desirs to seeme to be able to swaye all men's fancies, all men's cowrses, and a man out of himself; when your time sall come will never be able to do yow muche goode nor hear me. Yet must I needs confesse what I know, that there is excellent good parts of natur in hem, a man whose love is disadvantageous to me in somme sort, which I cherish rather out of constancie than policie, and one whome I wish Your Majesty not to lose, because I woulde not that one haire of a man's head sould be against yow that might be for yow.' This was written when Elizabeth was already sickening for her last illness, and it sets forth the impression of the weak time-server, that the powerful favourite, the great genius of whom he had been a satellite for years, was already a man to be damned with faint praise, to be contemptuously apologised for, but who henceforward could do neither good nor harm. To this had Raleigh been brought by the sneers and slanders of Howard and Cecil, during eighteen months' correspondence with the suspicious coming King. Raleigh's absence in Jersey and the west country had also been taken advantage of by Cecil to turn the old Queen's mind against her favourite, in accordance with the Machiavellian suggestions of Howard already quoted; and in the last months of the reign, the shadow of disgrace was already descending rapidly upon him. When, therefore, on the 24th March 1603, the great Queen breathed her last, the seed so laboriously and secretly sown by Cecil had produced its harvest; the new King was ready to look upon Raleigh as a traitor, and out of Cornwall hardly a man in England would say a good word for the erstwhile splendid favourite.

Immediately the Queen died, a meeting of the principal public men was held at Whitehall to decide upon the proclamation of a successor. Raleigh was not a privy councillor, but he was summoned from the country, came and signed the letter of welcome to the King with the rest. It is difficult for Englishmen in these times to conceive the distrust and dislike then entertained for Scotsmen. They were of course foreigners, and had for centuries been more or less closely allied to France, the secular enemy of England; their country was poor, and a large portion of it in semi-savagery; and it was an article of faith with most patriotic Englishmen, that the Scot must never be allowed to dominate this country. But the fates had fought in favour of James. The tardy and cumbrous methods of Philip's Government, the attempt of Spain to grasp more than she could hold, had for forty years frustrated all efforts from that quarter to re-establish influence in England. When at last the looked-for day arrived, and the throne of England was vacant, Spain again was too late. We have seen that the formal decision to adopt and aid with men and money any Catholic or moderate candidate who should be chosen by the English themselves against James Stuart, had only been arrived at on the 2nd March, which—allowing for difference of the calendars—was only about a month before Elizabeth's death. There was time for the Catholic and anti-Scots English party to choose Arabella Stuart as their candidate, but not time for the proposed Spanish support to be prepared to aid her. There was practically therefore no other candidate than James ready at the time of the Queen's death, and the best that the patriotic party could do was to endeavour to limit to some extent the anticipated ravages of the Scottish locusts upon the fat pastures of the south. At the meeting at Whitehall, Raleigh's is said to have been the voice that gave utterance to this feeling. He expressed an opinion that some limit ought to be placed on the power of the new King to appoint Scotsmen to English offices. Doubtless many thought so as well; but each man was eagerly looking out for his own future, and dared not anger the coming King.

The people at large had so long anticipated trouble on the death of the Queen, that they were in a fever of unreasoning rejoicing and loyalty to the man who appeared to be able to save them from the affliction of civil war, and Raleigh's voice, if it gave forth such utterances as those mentioned, found no echo outside. Aubrey says—although it is probably untrue—that at the meeting at Whitehall Raleigh proposed a republic, and gives his words as, 'Let us keep the staff in our own hands, and set up a commonwealth and not remain subject to a needy beggarly nation.' In any case, he lost no time, any more than his colleagues, in trying to curry favour by the most abject flattery with the new King.

James set forth for his new kingdom in the beginning of April. The exodus of courtiers and favour-seekers from London to meet the sovereign threatened to be so great that a proclamation was issued forbidding any person in the public service from resorting to the King; and Cecil advised Raleigh not to go. Raleigh, however, held many high offices, which gave him right of access to the royal person, and he disregarded the advice. He met the King for the first time at Burghley House, his excuse for coming being the need of the King's authority for the continuance of legal process in the Duchy of Cornwall. Several stories have been told of the words that passed between them; that the King openly insulted him by telling him that he thought very 'rawly' of him, a poor pun on his name; and others of a similar sort; but without giving undue credit to Aubrey's gossip, it may be safely concluded that there was no cordiality in the interview. Raleigh got the document he wanted as soon as might be so, that he might have no pretext for staying, and Lake reported to Cecil that he 'had taken no great root here.' Then blow after blow fell upon Raleigh. Soon after his return to London he was summoned to the Council Chamber and informed that he had been deprived of his office of Captain of the Guard, and that Sir Thomas Erskine had been appointed in his place. Rumour in the streets had already anticipated this; as well it might, for Cecil had planned the dismissal long before. He had apparently asked the King for the disposal of the office; as Mr Bruce, writing to Lord Henry Howard, says (25th March 1603), 'So long as 30 (i.e., King James) sall have need of a guard, so long sall it be at 10 (i.e., Cecil's) charge.'

What looked like a favour was granted to Raleigh soon afterwards, but it was not for his benefit. His Governorship of Jersey had been charged with the payment of £300 a year to Lord Henry Seymour, and he was relieved from this payment, but in less than two months the Governorship of Jersey itself was taken away from him. But a more serious loss preceded this. Almost the first act done by the new King was to consider, with a view to their abrogation, the various monopolies granted by Elizabeth. They were very unpopular, and much of Raleigh's own unpopularity was owing to his tavern licensing patent; it was needful for the new King to please the people, and the monopolies were called in. The petition prompting the measure had been especially aimed at Raleigh, but a question arose as to whether his licensing patent was a monopoly at all. It was easy, however, to find a pretext for injuring Raleigh, and his patent was suspended until the question was decided; and he was thus suddenly deprived of his most profitable source of income. Then came the occupation of the crown house of Durham Place. The house had been formerly the palace of the bishops of Durham, but had been taken by the crown, and for many years had been used as a royal guest-house. The Spanish ambassadors had lived there during the reign of Mary, and part of that of Elizabeth, but from 1583 Raleigh had made it his town residence. The part towards the Strand—stables and offices—had already become somewhat ruinous, and the great hall, which was a common thoroughfare for the neighbours going to get water from the conduit in the inner court, had been injured by fire. The character of the Strand, moreover, was changing, and there is no doubt that Cecil and Raleigh had already discussed the conversion of the stable front into something more fitting to a street which was becoming a principal one. Cecil's own house was only separated from it by the narrow thoroughfare called Ivy Lane, and he had already cast covetous eyes across. Toby Matthew, the Bishop of Durham, had welcomed the King as effusively as if he had never abused him; and, of course, at Cecil's suggestion, had begged from James the restitution to him of the ancient palace of the See. Matthew got the palace, but very soon the ramshackle congeries of stables and outhouses on the Strand front were transferred to Cecil, who built the new exchange called Britain's Bourse upon the site, to the great advantage of himself and his successors ever since. Raleigh had spent large sums in repairing and partly rebuilding the river front; he had lived undisturbed in the place for twenty years; but he was turned out with every circumstance of harshness. The King's warrant to the Lord Keeper and the Judges, dated 31st May 1603, sets forth that the law having decided that the persons 'that now dwell in the Bishop of Duresme's house, called Duresme Place, have no right therein' . . . they are to have notice to quit. Raleigh begged earnestly to be allowed to stay until Michaelmas, which the Bishop thought 'nothing reasonable,' and he was obliged to go by midsummer. He was also forbidden to remove any fixtures, 'which' he wrote to the Lord Keeper Egerton, 'seemeth to mee very strange, seeinge that I have had possession of the howse these xx. yeares, and have bestowed well nere £2000 uppon the same.' He says that the meanest gentleman in England would have had six months'

notice to quit, and even a poor artificer is entitled to three months' notice from his landlord. He had, he said, laid in provisions and fodder for forty persons, and as many horses, 'and to remove my family and stuff in 14 days is such a severe expulsion as hath not bynn offered to any man before this daye.' But there was no consideration for Raleigh now, and he was obliged to go.

Raleigh did not fall without a struggle. He professed the profoundest submission to the King's will. He offered to raise 2000 men with which to fight Spain if the King would strike at the enemy, which was now at the last gasp of exhaustion. He sought to gain the new King's ear with his patriotism and eloquence, as he had won that of his dead mistress. But he had a different sovereign to deal with. The base craven who had succeeded to the grand inheritance was all for truckling, and Raleigh could have taken no course more likely to be unpalatable to the Scottish Solomon than to give him bold and patriotic counsel. But though he tried in vain to win his way back to favour by submission and flattery of the man he must have despised, his proud heart must have raged with fury at the indignity to which he was subjected. The French Ambassador, Beaumont, writes to Villeroy in May that Raleigh had been dismissed. 'Dont le dit Sieur Rallé est en telle furie, que partant pour aller trouver le roy, il a protesté de lui faire declarer et faire voir par escrit toute la caballe et les intelligences que le Sieur Cecil a dressées, et conduites a son prejudice.' Cecil himself, writing in August to inform Sir Thomas Parry of Raleigh's arrest, says, 'This hath been the cause. First, he hath been discontented in conspectu omnium ever since the King came, and yet for those offices taken from him the King gave him £300 a year during his life. Secondly, his inwardness, or rather his governing Lord Cobham's spirit, made great suspicion that in these treasons he had part.' Now we see how the snare referred to by Howard to be set for them had been worked. Cobham was weak, shifty and garrulous; his family had been leaning to the Spanish side for years, and he could easily be led into, or be detected in, a compromising position, whilst Raleigh could be drawn up by the same throw of the net, because of his 'inwardness' with, and influence over Cobham, and yet Cobham was the brother-in-law, and Raleigh the life-long friend of Cecil.

It was not to be expected that the Catholic party in England, which had learnt before Elizabeth's death of the intention of the King of Spain to help with all his might the English candidate they might choose, should calmly settle down to the new order of things which disappointed all their hopes. The decision of Philip III. was adopted too late for the plans to be carried into effect when the Queen died, and it was natural that the ferment of the plot should work to the surface in some form or another before affairs became normal. For years disputes had raged in the bosom of the Catholic party in England, a reflection of those that existed amongst the exiles. The Jesuits, with Parsons in Rome or in Spain, were bound heart and soul to the Spanish interest, as we have seen. The secular priests, on the contrary, had, as time went on, resented the unquiet and unpatriotic action of the Jesuits, and had assumed the moderate attitude advocated by the French party and, generally speaking, by the Vatican. They resented the idea of having a king imposed upon England by Spanish pikes. If they could not have a Catholic sovereign they would put up with a Protestant, if only he would refrain from persecuting them. Two of the leaders of this party of priests—Watson and Clarke—disappointed that James had not consented to grant toleration, formed a plan in imitation of several that had been resorted to during James's youth in Scotland, of seizing him and extorting from him a decree of full religious toleration. Their confederates were few and unimportant, two or three Catholic gentlemen, Anthony Copley, Sir Griffin Markham, Lord Cobham's brother George Brooke, and, at first, Lord Grey de Wilton, who wanted toleration for the Puritans, but who was deceived with regard to the real objects of the plot. Anything which would have the effect of bringing about religious concord in England was naturally opposed to the objects of the Jesuit party, which aimed, at least, at Catholic supremacy ; and some of the Jesuit fathers who had heard of the plot communicated it to Cecil. The foolish and ill-considered conspiracy was called the 'Bye' or Priests' Treason, and there is no proof of any sort that Raleigh was connected with it ; although Cobham must at least have been cognisant of it.

Copley was arrested on the 6th July. His declarations caused the apprehension of George Brooke on the 14th ; and orders were given for that of Markham, Lord Grey and the priests. On the day before, or the day of Brooke's arrest, Raleigh was walking on the terrace at Windsor, waiting to ride in the train of the King, who was going hunting. Cecil approached him, and said that the Council wished to ask him some questions. He attended the chamber, and was asked whether he knew anything of the plot to surprise and seize the King, and he replied with truth that he did not. He was then interrogated as to his knowledge of plots in favour of Arabella, or of treasonable communications between his friend, Lord Cobham, and the Flemish ambassador, Count Aremberg. He professed ignorance of any such plots or communications, and was then allowed to retire. In fact, George Brooke, while under examination about the 'Bye' Conspiracy, had opened up a wider vista than that of the Priests' Treason, by confessing knowledge of a more important plot being hatched between his brother, Cobham, and Count Aremberg; and on the 19th July Cobham himself was interrogated by the Council, and denied all knowledge of the plot attributed to him by his brother. When Raleigh's interrogations had been concluded, he took a step which, in the obscurity which now surrounds the whole business, seems inexplicable, and which he himself subsequently confessed, brought about the ruin which ensued. Cobham was his friend and close political associate, and any proof of treason against him could hardly fail to affect Raleigh; and yet the latter, after his examination was ended, wrote to Cecil that he suspected that Cobham had intelligence with Aremberg—with whom he had, to the knowledge of the Cecils, carried on a correspondence for years — because after Cobham's visiting Durham House, Raleigh had seen him pass his own water gate at Blackfriars, and row over to St Saviours, Southwark, where there lodged a certain La Renzi, a follower of Aremberg's. This letter of Raleigh's, which was intended to be sent to the Council, was by Cecil's advice withheld. Cecil advised Raleigh not to speak of these suspicions, as the King did not wish to cast odium upon Aremberg, and Raleigh then told Cecil that if he did not lay hands on La Renzi the latter would escape, and the matter would never be discovered, and yet if La Renzi were arrested Cobham would at once suspect something. This was a fatal, and on the face of it, a foolish thing for Raleigh to do; for it inferred that he knew much more than he said, and placed him absolutely in Cecil's power. The letter he had written was immediately shown by Cecil to Cobham, who was then under examination. He fell into the trap, jumped to the conclusion that Raleigh had betrayed him, flew into a rage and denounced Raleigh. 'Oh, traitor! Oh, villain! I will now tell you all the truth,' he cried, and he then assured his examiners 'that he had never entered into these courses but by the instigation of Raleigh, who would never let him alone.' Not many minutes elapsed, however, before even foolish Cobham saw the fatal step he had taken in thus losing his temper; and before he got to the stairs leading from the chamber he retracted what he had said in his passion about Raleigh. He adhered, however, to his previous statement that he had conferred with Aremberg about procuring a large sum of money—600,000 crowns, he said—from the King of Spain, in the interests of peace between England and Spain, but had arranged that nothing further should be done in the matter 'until he had spoken to Sir Walter Raleigh for the distribution of the money to them which were discontented in England. Cobham was again examined on the 29th July, and quite cleared Raleigh of complicity in his dealings, and took the whole of the blame upon himself. This turn of affairs did not suit Cecil, who, having gone so far, could not stop short now of ruining Raleigh. The latter had been sent to the Tower immediately after Cobham's passionate denunciation of him on the 20th July, and it was easy to investigate any communications that had passed between him and Cobham since then, which might explain the latter's change of tone. After Raleigh's first examination at Windsor, when he professed entire ignorance of Cobham's intercourse with Aremberg, and presumably before he wrote the fatal letter of suspicion to Cecil, he had sent Captain Kemys to Cobham to say that the Council had asked certain questions about Cobham, but that he had cleared him; and then, unfortunately, Kemys had added an exhortation to Cobham 'to be of good comfort, for one witness could not condemn a man for treason.' Raleigh says he gave Kemys no such compromising message, and this may be true; but if Kemys invented the words himself he was certainly very badly inspired, for they were reported and made the most of against his master. This, however, was in the earlier stages. Between the 20th and 29th July, when both Raleigh and Cobham were in the Tower, the latter saw from his window young John Peyton, the son of the Governor, in conversation with Raleigh. Some hours afterwards Peyton came to visit Cobham, and the latter mentioned that he had seen him talking with Raleigh. 'God forgive him! He hath accused me, but I cannot accuse him.' Peyton replied, 'He doth say the like of you : that you have accused him, but he cannot accuse you.'

The only person who seems to have been actively engaged in the two separate sets of negotiations, respectively called the Bye or Priests' Treason, and the Main or Spanish Treason, was George Brooke. He, Copley, Watson the priest, and Lord Grey, were examined again and again. Statements wrung out of one prisoner were artfully dangled before another to induce further confidences, until each one seemed to compete with his fellows in his eagerness to make a clean breast of it. Brooke had been told at the beginning that the only way to procure favour 'is to open all that possibly you can.' He began by saying that 'the Bye Conspirators amongst themselves thought Sir Walter Raleigh a fit man to be of the action.' This, it was clear, did not implicate Raleigh; but, as time went on, Brooke, either out of revenge or hope of favour, became ready to incriminate both him and Cobham as far as the examiners might desire. He was ready to drag in many other names—Sir George Carew, Sir Henry Brounker and others—but afterwards confessed that he had only thought they might be likely to be concerned in anything favourable to Lady Arabella. In a letter to the Council Brooke plainly indicates that he has made his reckless statements under promise of reward. 'Whilst I breathe, if not after,

I shall claime those promises I have receaved both from the King and your Lordships. . . . To object errors committed sure is a frivolous cavilation, seinge I have committed none but for wante of the direction required.' The testimony of this man who, Raleigh said at his trial, 'never loved him,' and 'had been taught his lesson,' was to the effect that his brother Cobham had told him that Raleigh was not in the Bye Plot, but only in the Main, the object of which, he said, was to take away the King and his issue, which on his conscience, he thought had been suggested to his brother by Raleigh. Watson the priest deposed that Brooke had told him that Sir Walter Raleigh was upon the Main, the object of which was to destroy 'the King and all his cubs.' Watson also said that he had heard that the disturbances were to begin in Scotland, where he concluded that the Spaniards were to enter; and Copley testified that Brooke had told him that Raleigh had suggested the commencement of disturbances in Scotland. I have transcripts of original documents in my possession which prove absolutely that this was untrue, so far as regards a project for a Spanish descent upon Scotland. The project had been a favourite one for many years with the Scottish Catholics, and had been embraced by Spain more than once, with the partial connivance of James himself; but shortly before Elizabeth's death, Francis Stuart, Earl of Bothwell, an exile in Madrid, had presented a complete plan for the introduction of Spanish troops into England through Scotland, and the names and particulars of all persons in favour of such action are given. The scheme was examined by Philip III. and his Council, and finally rejected, as it was considered that it would only benefit James, whom they could not trust. The idea of an introduction of a Spanish force through Scotland at the time in question was therefore absolutely at an end. La Renzi deposed that Raleigh had been present when he delivered letters to Cobham from Aremberg, but he alleged that the sole object of the letters was to procure peace. All these odds and ends of more or less suspicious testimony were carefully pieced together, but even then the evidence was obviously inadequate upon which to put a great man on trial for his life. Cobham had withdrawn his incriminating statement as soon as it was made, and Brooke's suborned testimony was the only direct evidence against him. Cobham's declarations were to the effect that his interviews and correspondence with Aremberg were with the object of negotiating for the King of Spain's providing Cobham with 500,000 or 600,000 crowns, to be distributed in England in the interests of a peace between the two countries; that Cobham was to go to Spain to discuss the application of the money, and on his way home was to call at Jersey, and see Raleigh, further to discuss the same matter, only, Cobham added during his anger, that he was afraid that if once he put himself into Raleigh's power in Jersey he might hand him and the money over to James with an incriminating statement. Raleigh's own statement to a certain extent bore out this. He said that Cobham had offered him 10,000 crowns of the money for the furthering of peace between England and Spain; but that he had answered, 'When I see the money I will make answer, for I thought it one of his ordinary idle conceits, and therefore made no account thereof; but this was, I think, before Count Aremberg's coming over.'

Raleigh knew that, with the procedure then adopted against prisoners for treason, he could hope neither for fairness nor impartiality on the part of his judges. He was keenly conscious of his unpopularity with the people, the King's dislike of him, and the bitter jealousy of the nobles, who had always hated him as an insolent upstart. It has been remarked that, like most sanguine and imaginative men, he easily fell into profound despair. Only a day after his arrival in the Tower he attempted to kill himself with a table knife, but merely inflicted a slight wound. Although for the authenticity of the pathetic and beautiful letter to his wife on the eve of his attempt there is not sufficient warrant for its reproduction here, there can be no reasonable doubt of the act itself. Biographers of Raleigh have sought to explain it according to their bias, some as an evidence of guilt, some otherwise. To me it seems that the man who could fall into the depths of misery expressed in Raleigh's letters, when the Queen had frowned upon him, would be extremely likely to descend to the level of suicide under the circumstances of utter ruin which faced him now. But this was only a first impulse of despair, and as the toils closed around him his great mind bent to the task of saving himself. He had been compelled to resign the Lord Wardenship of the Stannaries, and had been dismissed the Governorship of Jersey, in which he had been replaced by his late gaoler, Peyton. He was aware that the loose gossip of men like Watson and Brooke would not be sufficient to condemn him, if it were not confirmed by Cobham's declarations. In October Cobham requested the new Governor of the Tower, Sir George Harvey, to be allowed to write a letter to the Council exculpating Raleigh. 'God is my witness,' he said, 'it doth touch my conscience. I would fain have the words that the Lords used of my barbarousness in accusing him falsely.' Harvey concealed this request, and did nothing; desirous, doubtless, of pleasing Cecil. Soon afterwards, Raleigh caused an apple, enclosing a letter, to be thrown into Cobham's window in the Wardrobe Tower, praying him to do him justice, and to confess that he had wronged him by his accusations. Cobham answered this by a letter which did not seem sufficiently explicit to Raleigh, who begged him again to clear him at his trial. Instead of this Cobham wrote a letter including the following lines, which it is difficult to believe are insincere, notwithstanding what followed at the trial, which will be related in the next chapter : ‘Seeing myself so near my end, for the discharge of my own conscience, and freeing myself from your blood, which else will cry vengeance against me, I protest upon my salvation I never practised with Spain by your procurement. God so comfort me in this my affliction as you are a true subject for anything that I know. I will say as Daniel : Purus sum a sanguine hujus. So God have mercy upon my soul, as I know no treason by you.’ This letter was carefully concealed by Raleigh to be produced in due time in his own refutation.

CHAPTER XII

RALEGH'S TRIAL AT WINCHESTER — CONDEMNED TO DEATH—HIS PRAYERS FOR LIFE—REPRIEVE—IN THE TOWER

IN November 1603 the plague was raging in London and the law courts were transferred to Winchester. The indictment against Raleigh was for plotting with Cobham and Brooke 'to deprive the King of his crown and dignity; to subvert the Government and alter the true religion established in England, and to levy war against the King.' It had been formally presented at Staines on the 21st September, when the jury was carefully packed and the proceedings adjourned. Early in November Sir William Waad was instructed to convey Raleigh to Winchester for trial. The prisoner went in his own coach in charge of Sir Robert Mansel, 'and,' writes Mr Hicks to Lord Shrewsbury, 'it was almost incredible what bitter speeches they, the mob, exclaimed against him as he went along; which general hatred of the people would be to me worse than death; but he neglected and scorned it as from base and rascal people.' Waad himself reported to Cecil that it was 'touch-and-go whether Raleigh could be brought alive through such multitudes of unruly people as did exclaim against him.' The trial had been postponed until Aremberg had departed, loaded with presents and loving messages from James, who tried his hardest to persuade Beaumont, the French Ambassador, that Aremberg was quite unconnected with the affair, even after he had shown him the intercepted letters which proved his communications with Cobham. There was now nothing to prevent the sacrifice of Raleigh, whom, said Beaumont, James both feared and hated. The shameful scene took place in the Palace of the Bishops of Winchester, fitted up as a Court of King's Bench, and by special commission Raleigh's bitter enemy Henry Howard, his false friend Cecil, and Sir William Waad, were associated on the bench with the Lord Chamberlain, the Earl of Suffolk (Raleigh's old friend Lord Thomas Howard), the Earl of Devonshire (Blount), Lord Wotton, Sir John Stanhope, the two chief justices, Popham and Anderson, and two Puisne judges, Warburton and Gawdy. The prosecution was conducted by Coke, the attorney-general, a truculent scoundrel, whose vile abuse of the prisoner was so scandalous as to be rebuked even by Cecil; and from the moment that Raleigh appeared in court the result of the trial was a foregone conclusion. The general feeling in England was that he was guilty, but that the evidence was not strong enough to convict him. This latter circumstance, however, did not trouble Coke in the least. Raleigh pleaded Not guilty, and begged, as his health was broken and his memory impaired, that he might be allowed to answer the points of the indictment separately as they occurred; but Coke objecting, this was only permitted as the proofs were produced, and not as the points were set forth. The particulars of the trial have been so frequently printed that it will not be necessary to reproduce them here, but one or two samples of the mockery of justice may be quoted. With insult and vituperation unexampled in a court of law, Coke set forth the evidence that had been raked together against Cobham, and even against the conspirators of the Bye, in which it was admitted that Raleigh had no part. Raleigh protested that all this did not touch him in the least. He urged that the mere statements of the Attorney-General, without proof, were not evidence against him. 'I do not yet hear that you have spoken one word against me. Here is no treason of mine done. If my Lord Cobham be a traitor, what is that to me?' 'All that he did,' replied Coke, 'was by thy instigation, thou viper! for I thou thee, thou traitor. I will prove thee the rankest traitor in all England.' With a wit, readiness and resource, almost marvellous under the circumstances, Raleigh struggled against the inevitable. Whenever he seemed to be gaining a point, or the Attorney-General's vituperation ran short, Cecil or Henry Howard interposed with a speech as a diversion. None of the ordinary decent etiquette of a court of justice was preserved, even for appearance sake, and the whole proceeding was a tragic travesty. On one occasion Coke shouted, 'Your intent was to set up the Lady Arabella as a titular Queen, and to depose our present rightful King. You pretend that this money was to forward the peace with Spain. Your jargon was peace, which meant Spanish invasion and Scottish subversion,' to which Raleigh replied, 'Let me answer ; it concerns my life.' 'Thou shalt not,' bellowed Coke ; and Popham, the chief justice, bade the prisoner be silent. When Raleigh got his chance at last, he denied, eloquently and fervently, that he had ever entered into any plots with Cobham ; and demanded to be confronted with him. With glowing force he called to witness his past life, his constant struggles against Spain ever since he could bear arms. He knew, he said, how poor, weak and impotent Spain had become. Was he a madman, he asked, to make himself a Jack Cade for the sake of Spain now ? Of what Cobham had done he knew nothing. 'But for my knowing that he had conspired these things with Spain for Arabella against the King, I protest before Almighty God I am as clear as whosoever here is freest. Raleigh begged earnestly, but in vain, to be confronted with Cobham. If he, Cobham, on his honour, said that he had been.

instigated by him to treasonable plots in the interests of Spain, then he, Raleigh, would submit to be dealt with as the King willed. Raleigh stood firm in the possession of Cobham's letter, already quoted, solemnly absolving him from all share of blame. It looked almost as if it would be impossible to convict him without manifest scandal, when Coke produced his coup de theatre. Poor, weak, storm-tossed Cobham had been 'got at'—Raleigh said, probably with truth—by his wife, the Countess of Kildare, who was a Howard, and persuaded to buy favour by recanting his retractation, and again to accuse Raleigh. Coke read the letter in triumph. 'I have thought fit, in duty to my Sovereign,' it said, 'and in discharge of my conscience, to set this down to your Lordships; wherein I protest, upon my soul, to write nothing but what is true. For I am not ignorant of my present condition, and now to dissemble with God is no time.' Then he tells how Raleigh had induced him in the Tower to write the letter absolving him; and how the truth was that Raleigh had proposed to him to obtain from Aremberg a pension of £1500 a year from Spain to aid her interests and to report all that happened in England. Upon Raleigh he throws once more the whole blame of his ruin. The story of throwing the apple into Cobham's window was recounted, and Raleigh's letters to him disclosed; and then all hope for acquittal was gone, and Raleigh was found guilty.

Before the verdict was given the prisoner again spoke vigorously of Cobham's instability, and read the letter he had written absolving him, but all to no purpose, for the incriminating letter was later. He solemnly declared that he was innocent of any negotiations with Spain, that he knew nothing of any practices in favour of Arabella Stuart, and that he was ignorant of Cobham's dealings with Aremberg.

Then Popham's turn came, and he made the most of it. Coke's abuse had been virulent, but the Lord Chief Justice, in passing sentence of death, surpassed him in insult; and so one of the most undignified and scandalous pages in English jurisprudence came to a fitting close.

An eye-witness of the trial thus speaks of Raleigh's part in it: 'He did as much as wit of man could advise to clear himself. . . . Sir Walter Raleigh served for a whole act and played all the parts himself. . . . He answered with that wit, learning, courage and judgment, that, save that it went with the hazard of his life, it was the happiest day that he had ever spent. And so well he shifted all advantages that were taken against him, that, were not fama malum gravius quam res, and an ill name half hanged, in the opinion of all men, he would have been acquitted.'

Beaumont, the French Ambassador, echoed the general opinion when he said that Raleigh was probably guilty, but had been illegally condemned. It is certain that the evidence produced against him was absurdly inadequate. It was mostly loose gossip, depending upon Brooke, whose object in accusing his brother and Raleigh is difficult to understand, unless it was to save his own life, in which he failed. On the scaffold he hinted at some mystery behind it, which would surely come to light, and said something secretly which greatly alarmed Cecil, but which was never made public. The whole of the circumstances, however, which surround his evidence deprive it of any weight as against Raleigh. Cobham's frequent accusations and retractations are so contradictory of each other that it is impossible to arrive at anything like a final conclusion with regard to them. The letter, so triumphantly read by Coke in Court, does not appear, on examination, to be so incriminating of Raleigh as was hastily assumed at the trial. The writer asserts that Raleigh had promoted his discontent at the new order of things, which, if true, was perfectly natural, and certainly not treasonable ; and that he had asked him to obtain a pension from Spain for giving information ; and some colour is given to this by Raleigh's declaration, although, according to Cobham, he had taken no step in the matter. It is quite probable that this latter accusation was true. During Elizabeth's reign many of her ministers were constantly in the pay of Spain. Lord Henry Howard, Raleigh's enemy and judge, had been the chief spy for years. Cobham's kinsman, Sir Edward Stafford, the English Ambassador in Paris, had sold to Spain every secret he possessed up to the time of the Armada. Cecil himself was a Spanish pensioner, and we have seen how Raleigh had offered his services in 1586. The loose political morality of the time made such an offence venial, and there is nothing more likely than that Raleigh did make such a suggestion to Cobham. That Cobham himself was engaged before Elizabeth's death in the arrangement with Spain which I have described in previous pages, I have no doubt—half the nobility of England were so engaged—and it is extremely likely that Raleigh may have been sympathetic after he heard that the Spaniards would help any native candidate that might be chosen against the King of Scots. All this was certainly not treasonable until James had been accepted by the nation as King; and although Raleigh would naturally be discontented as a disgraced favourite and ruined courtier, there is not the remotest evidence, except Cobham's subsequent unsupported accusations at his (Cobham's) trial, that after the accession of James Raleigh had proposed a plot for the landing of a Spanish force at Milford Haven or elsewhere. The Spanish State papers conclusively prove that no such project was entertained at the time. The whole life record of Raleigh, moreover, was against it. A careful consideration of such documentary evidence as exists convinces me that Raleigh was not a party to any plot to depose James by the help of Spain, but that he was quite willing to accept a pension from the latter ; and that, before Elizabeth's death, he belonged to the very large party in England which was opposed to the Scottish domination of their country. When he was approached — as he must have been—shortly before the Queen's death, with the news that the Infanta had finally abandoned her claim, and that Spain would now support any candidate chosen by the English, who would grant toleration and peace, he would no doubt welcome such an apparently safe and patriotic solution of the difficulty ; not that he had any particular sympathy for Arabella, but to prevent the subjugation of the greater country by the lesser. This was probably the foundation of all of Cobham's tergiversation. Raleigh, however, was far too worldly wise and ambitious to oppose established facts ; and I am convinced that, after James' accession, he did not plot to depose him. The doubt expressed by Cobham as to whether Raleigh did not intend to betray him, if he went to Jersey, is unsupported, except by the gossip of Raleigh's enemies. Southampton certainly believed it, as did Bishop Goodman ; but Raleigh's character was considered so unprincipled by his contemporaries that they would be sure to adopt the most ungenerous view of his intentions. Brooke was beheaded in the castle yard at Winchester on the 16th December, full of vague hints of mystery behind his statements ; but he said nothing definite, except to withdraw the words he had attributed to his brother about the 'fox and his cubs.' The priests, Watson and Clarke, were submitted to the inhuman torture imposed for high treason: half-hanged, cut down, their entrails torn from their living bodies, and their quarters exposed on the city gates. But James was not fond of blood. His councillors urged him not to begin his reign by severity, and his Queen used all her influence in Raleigh's favour. Peace with Spain, moreover, was in the air, and James desired it of all things. Aremberg's reception had encouraged the coming of a Spanish Ambassador, for the first time for twenty years. He was that Don Juan Bautista de Tassis, through whom Mary Stuart had conveyed her assurance of exclusive attachment to the Spanish interests. He, too, begged the King to be merciful to the condemned. It could not be questioned that their execution would be a jarring note in the concord which was being so laboriously concluded between the two countries, and in the interests of which De Tassis was giving and promising vast sums of money to the men who surrounded the King. But to all prayers for mercy James affected to be deaf, and planned a mystification thoroughly characteristic of him. On the 8th December he signed the death warrants for Cobham, Grey and Markham, whose execution was fixed for the 9th. What followed may be told in Cecil's own words, written to Winwood, on the 12th December, from Wilton. 'It remaineth that I tell you what succeeded of the rest; wherein if you could as well by relation apprehend all the circumstances as we did, you would, equally with us, admire the excellent mixture of the King's mercy with justice, for even after he had first absolutely taught us all our duties, to leave all mediation in this case (mercy being only his), he signed three warrants for the execution of the two Lords, Cobham and Grey, with Sir Griffin Markham, all to be done on the same day, Friday following, pretending to forbear Sir Walter Raleigh for the present, until Lord Cobham's death had given some light how far he would make good his accusation. Which being done (God of Heaven doth know it), we here at Wilton expected nothing till Friday at 9 o'clock, to hear from Winchester of their execution : until it pleased the King that very morning here at Wilton to call his Council together, and told them what order he had taken ; to which, upon my credit and reputation, he made no soul living privy, the messenger excepted, whom he dispatched the day before with the warrant, written all in his own hand, which was used in manner following : Sir Griffin Markham, whose turn was first to be executed, being brought forth upon the scaffold at the hour appointed, and there having made his prayers and spoken what else he thought good, prepared himself to lay down his head for the stroke, at which instant one Mr Gibb, a Scottish gentleman of the King's bed chamber, who was the messenger, stepped forth and drew the Sheriff aside, presenting him his warrant ; whereupon the Sheriff (not making any show at all of what he received, nor giving the least cause to hope for that which afterwards followed) turned again to the prisoner, and told him he was to go forth of the place for a while, causing him to be led down into the Castle hall, not far from the place of execution. In the meanwhile, Lord Grey was sent for, who, doing much as the other had done before him, with a full resolution to die, after his prayers ended and his preparation otherwise made, was commanded likewise to be led down from the place to the Castle hall, which proceeding of the Sheriff neither of them apprehended to their least comfort, but imagined it was for some other purpose. Now, this being done, the next turn was Lord Cobham's, who was brought forth upon the scaffold, and there made himself as ready to die as the rest, till the Sheriff commanded his execution to be stayed for a while, sending for the other two forth of the hall, and then, being all three together on the scaffold, he signified his Majesty's gracious pleasure unto them all, which was received, as well of themselves as of all the standers by, with such joy and admiration as so rare and unheard of clemency most worthily deserved.'

Markham, we are told by an eyewitness was 'sad and heavy, the very picture of sorrow,' although his demeanour was fearless and dignified. Lord Grey, devout Puritan as he was, beloved, popular and brave,

was bright and cheerful, surrounded by friends, and fully reconciled to death. He prayed long and fervently in the drizzling rain that fell, and then once again protested the truth, that he had never plotted treason. He had, in fact, been drawn into the Bye or Priests' Conspiracy by misrepresentation, and had retired from it when he understood its scope and objects. 'His going away seemed more strange unto him than his coming thither, for he had no more hope given him than of an hour's respite. Neither could any man yet dive into the mysteries of this strange proceeding.'

Cobham's fortitude on the scaffold was a strong contrast to his demeanour during his imprisonment and trial. It was probably the fortitude of despair. He answered that 'what he had said of Sir Walter Raleigh is true, as he hoped for his soul's resurrection,' but which of the many conflicting statements he had made about him he referred to is not clear. His latest accusation, with regard to the proposal for bringing Spanish troops to Milford, was the most damning ; but no dates are given in it, and even if it were true, and referred to a period before the Queen's death, it was not treason against James. Cobham's own letters, indeed, to Cecil, speak of the plans with regard to Arabella as having been abandoned long before, in all probability when James's accession was assured. During all the tragi-comedy of the deferred executions at Winchester, Raleigh had sat at a window in full view of the scaffold. Through the silver veil of fine rain he had watched, with wondering eyes, the successive disappearance of the prisoners from the place of the execution, and the reappearance of them together to be harangued by the Sheriff. He must then have understood, though he was out of earshot, that his companions in misfortune were not to die; and shortly afterwards his own reprieve was communicated to him.

Raleigh's conduct on many occasions prove him to have been a man of undaunted courage. It was common for him in his periods of disappointment and distress to pray and yearn for death; and yet, such is the perversity of human nature, no poltroon could have begged for life more abjectly than he did. To the Lords of the Council, to Cecil, to the King, in turn, he addressed his beseeching letters for bare life. Lord Grey, with greater dignity, was deeply distressed at the disgrace which was to fall upon his illustrious house, but disdained to sue for his life. Raleigh, on the other hand, threw his dignity to the winds, and both he, personally, and his agonised wife, prayed, with a humility that approaches baseness, that his life might be spared on any terms. After his abject letters to the Lords, Raleigh himself appears to have become ashamed of them. He writes to his wife: 'Get those letters, if it be possible, which I wrote to the Lords, wherein I sued for my life. God knows that it was for you and yours that I desired it. But it is true that I disdain myself for begging it.' This letter to his wife was written in December, when he thought all hope was gone, and it is a beautiful specimen of pathetic English. A few short extracts only can be given here. 'You shall receive, dear wife, my last words in these my last lines. My love I send you, that you may keep it when I am dead, and my counsel, that you may remember it when I am no more. I would not with my last will present you with sorrows, dear Bess. Let them go to the grave with me, and be buried with me in the dust. And, seeing it is not the will of God that I shall ever see you in this life, beare my destruction gentlie, and with a heart like yourself. First, I send you all the thanks my heart can conceive, or my pen expresse, for your many troubles and cares taken for me, which—though they have not taken effect as you wished—yet my debt is to you never the less ; but pay it I never shall, in this world.' After begging her not to mourn him long, advising her to marry again, and deploring the poor fortune he leaves behind him for her and their son, he proceeds, 'Remember your poore childe, for his father's sake, that comforted you and loved you in his happiest times, and know itt, dear wife, that your sonne is the childe of a true man, who, in his own respect, despiseth death and all his misshapen and ugly forms. I cannot write much. God knowes howe hardlie I stole this tyme when all sleep ; and it is time to separate my thoughts from the world. Begg my dead body, which, living, was denyed you ; and either lay itt at Sherborne or in Exeter Church, by my father and mother. I can write no more ; tyme and death call me awaye.

‘The everlasting, infinite, powerfull, and inscrutable God : that Almighty God that is goodness itself, mercy itself, the true light and life, keep you and yours, and have mercy on me, and teach me to forgive my persecutors and false accusers, and send us to meet in His glorious kingdom. My true wife, farewell. Blesse my poore boye. Pray for me. My true God hold you both in His armes. Written with the dying hand of sometyme thy husband, but now, alas ! overthrowne. Yours that was, but now not my owne. W. RALEGH.’ This was the true Raleigh, in his better moments, and it is difficult to understand how the fine spirit that prompted such utterances could stoop to address his ‘Most dread Sovereigne,’ the despicable James Stuart, in such terms as these. ‘But the greate God so relieve me and mine in both worlds, as I was the contrary (of discontented), and as I tooke no greater comfort than to behold Your Majesty, and always learning some good, and bettering my knowledge by Your Majesty’s discourse. . . . For myself, I protest before the everlasting God, and to my master and Sovereign, that I never invented treason, consented to treason, nor performed treason against him ; and yet I know that I shall fall, in manus eorum a quibus non possum exsurgere, unless by Your Majesty's great compassion I be sustained. . . . I do therefore, on the knees of my hart, beseich Your Majesty to take counsel from your own sweet and mercifull disposition, and to remember that I have loved Your Majesty now twenty years, for which Your Majesty hath yett given me no reward. And it is fitter that I should be indebted to my Sovereign Lord, than the King to his poore vassall. Save me, therefore, most merciful Prince, that I may owe to Your Majesty my life itself, than which there cannot be a greater debt. Lend it to me at least, my Sovereign Lord, that I may pay it agayne for your service, when Your Majesty shall please. If the law destroy me, Your Majesty shall put me out of your power; and I shall have then none to fear, none to reverence but the King of Kings—' and Raleigh signs this 'your penitent vassall.' To the Council he writes: 'For the mercy of God do not doubt to move so mercifull a prince to compassion, and that the extremity of all extremities be not laid on me. Lett the offence be esteemed as your Lordships shall please in charity to believe it, and value it; yet it is but my first offence, and my service to my country, and my love so many years to my supreme Lord, I trust may move so greate and goode a kinge, who was never esteemed cruel. . . . And if I may not begg a pardon or a life, yet lett me begg a tyme at the King's merciful hands. Lett me have one year in prison to give to God and to serve Hyme. I trust his pitiful nature will have compassion on my sowle; and it is my sowle that beggeth a tyme of the Kinge.'

The arrogant favourite, who, in the days of his splendour, had ridden roughshod over ancient nobles who had dared to become his rivals for the Queen's smile, could fall no lower than this, let the reason for his supplication have been what it may.

Raleigh and his fellow-prisoners were brought to the Tower of London less than a week after the farce on the scaffold at Winchester. Thence they were conveyed to the Fleet, and so backward and forward, between the two prisons, several times before Raleigh finally settled down with his wife and child in the not incommodious rooms in the Bloody Tower.

His love of life was still strong within him. Whilst he lived the possibilities of his indomitable energy and powerful intellect were unbounded, and his busy mind was full of vast and far-reaching plans. True, he was a ruined man, and his enemies triumphed over him to the utmost. All his offices were forfeited. The wine patent was granted to the Lord Admiral. Sherborne and the other estates were in the hands of royal commissioners, creditors were clamouring for payment, rapacious agents were plundering everything they could grasp, and, for a time, it looked as if beggary as complete as that which fell upon Cobham, would afflict Raleigh. But his brave wife struggled hard, and Cecil did his best to help her. Now that there was no danger of rivalry from Raleigh in the King's favour, some of his old friendship came back again. He had no desire to compass his death or absolute ruin; but that Raleigh should ever become the chief adviser of the new King he was determined at any cost to prevent. When once this danger was at an end Cecil had no particular reason for carrying his rancour to further extremes, and during the rest of his life remained in friendly communication with Lady Raleigh. Raleigh had many a hard struggle yet before he could feel sure that he and his would be saved from penury. The Sherborne estate, whilst in the charge of the royal commissioners, had been stripped and rifled; his plate was 'all lost, or eaten out with interest,' at Chenie's the goldsmith in Lombard Street; his agent in the patent of wines, Saunderson, made ruinous claims against him; and for the first few months of his imprisonment, sometimes in the Tower, sometimes in the Fleet, it was a constant struggle to save some shreds of his wasted fortune. From the first he was beset with difficulties about Sherborne. In 1602 he had executed a conveyance of the estates to his son, subject to a charge in favour of Lady Raleigh, and his own life interest. By the intervention of Cecil the interests of the lady and her son were respected on Raleigh's attainder, and the estates conveyed for 60 years in trust for them. But, by an omission of the clerk, who engrossed the deed of 1602, certain necessary words were lacking. The crown lawyers declared that the deed was void, and that the estates had consequently been vested only in Raleigh; but no fresh action was taken, and here the matter remained for some years, the revenues, or such of them as could be rescued from the unjust steward Meeres, being received and employed by Lady Raleigh in the maintenance of her husband and family. When the prisoner at last settled in the Tower there began the long battle of the active soaring spirit against the numbing monotony of a gaol. Like the seabird dashing itself to death against a lighthouse, the restless energies of Raleigh beat themselves in vain against the walls of his prison. But though his body grew cold and pulseless, and his hair turned to snow, his great intellect shone the brighter in the gloom that surrounded it.

CHAPTER XIII

PRAYERS FOR PARDON—LIFE IN THE TOWER—THE SHERBORNE ESTATE GIVEN TO CAR — PRINCE HENRY AND QUEEN ANNE—THE ‘HISTORY OF THE WORLD’—NEW PLANS FOR AN EXPEDITION TO GUIANA—RELEASE FROM THE TOWER

RALEGH was ever a good suppliant. During the whole of his life he was begging favours for himself or others, apparently never contented or satisfied. When, after the reprieve of Cobham, Grey and Markham, he sent his last prayer for life to the Council, he wrote : ‘The Lord of Heaven doth know that if it shall pleas my most gracious Lord the King to geve mee that poore life, that I shall as faythfully and thankfully serve hyme, eating but bread and drinking water, as whosoever that hath receved even the greatest honour or the greatest profyte. For a greater gift none can geve, none receive, than life. . . . My Lords, do me this grace to believe, and vouchsafe to say it for mee to my Soverayne Lorde, that the loss of my estate, which I have deservedly lost, cannot make me less faythful or less lovinge both to his state and person.' But no sooner was his life granted, and almost blasphemous thanks given for it to the King, than the prayers for fresh favours became incessant. He wrote to Cecil, praying that his lands might be restored to him personally, in order that he might pay his debts and maintain himself in the Tower. Then he boldly prays the Lord Treasurer for liberty as the 'Bye' Conspirators had been released; and this being fruitless, he beseeches the King himself in the most servile terms to have mercy upon a miserable prisoner. This was on the 21st January 1604, only a few weeks after he had been saved from the scaffold, and Cecil plainly told Lady Raleigh that, 'as for a pardon, it could not be done.' But still he continued to beg of Cecil. 'If I may not be here about London (which God cast my sowle into hell if I desire, but to do your Lordship some service) I shall be most contented to be confined within the Hundred of Sherborne, or if I cannot be allowed so much, I shall be contented to live in Holland.' His private affairs, his liberty, his comfort in the Tower, his property, were all the subjects of unceasing petitions to Cecil, to his son Lord Cranborne, to the Council, to the King. His petitions were eloquent, pathetic, plaintive, as usual; but it is extremely difficult to reconcile them with the possession of any real dignity of mind in the writer. No sooner was one favour wrung out than another one was prayed for, with the same lachrymose persistence as the last. Disappointed ambition and chafing energy wore out the prisoner's health. His apartments in the Bloody, or Garden, Tower, were large enough for the accommodation of himself, his wife and son, a second son, Carew, who was born in the Tower soon after his imprisonment, Lady Raleigh's maid, and other servants. He had the use of a terrace overlooking the Tower-wharf and the river, and was allowed the occupation of a small out-house in the garden for his chemical experiments; but the place was damp, so near the Thames and the moat, and almost from the first the prisoner complained that the confinement was killing him. 'He was in daily danger of death,' he said, 'by the palsy that afflicted him, and of nightly suffocation by wasted and obstructed lungs.' Then the plague broke out in a neighbouring lodging, and he clamoured for removal to another place, if he might not be released. At last, in 1606, the physicians reported that he was really ill. The whole of one side of him was cold, his fingers were contracted, and it was feared that he was losing the power of speech; and this report effected what Raleigh's own prayers had been unable to obtain, a change in his lodging. He was allowed to build a little room attached to the out-house in the garden, and to make it his chamber. Within the limits of his prison the restless energy of Raleigh at length found food for occupation which afforded him solace and has done much to enhance his reputation with posterity. His twelve years of incessant literary labour in the Tower have left behind him a permanent memorial of his marvellous and far-reaching powers, which, but for his enforced seclusion, would, in all probability, never have been produced, and the extent of Raleigh's genius would not have been understood. Such of his servants as could not find room in the Tower lived hard by, and were in constant attendance upon him, especially the Indians he had brought from Guiana with him. His friends and relatives were allowed to visit him freely with books and news. He frequently dined with Sir George Harvey, the Governor of the Tower, and in many ways was treated with leniency. His chemical and mineralogical researches in the laboratory at first occupied much of his time, and in the intervals of labour he was able to satisfy his vanity by parading on the terrace, splendidly dressed as usual, in full view of the crowds on the wharf, who came far and near to see so famous a man; for there had been a curious revulsion of public feeling in his favour after his condemnation. But Sir William Waad, who for so many years had been Clerk of the Council, was appointed to the Governorship of the Tower in August 1605, and such proceedings were looked upon suspiciously. First a brick wall was built before the Bloody Tower gate; and then, in 1608, Waad formally complained to Cecil that 'Sir Walter Raleigh doth show himself upon the wall of his garden to the view of the people who gaze upon him, and he stareth upon them. Which he doeth in his cunning humour, that it might be thought his being before the Council was rather to clear than to charge him'; and thenceforward whilst Waad was in command many petty restrictions were placed upon both Raleigh and his wife—the latter being forbidden to drive her coach in the courtyard, and the like. Though he was a close prisoner, it pleased the Government to suspect him of complicity in every seditious practice. He was examined about the Gunpowder Plot, and several times during the next few years, on the reports of spies, or in the hope of fishing out some secret, Raleigh was interrogated by the Council. Once in 1610, on some trifling excuse, he was condemned to close imprisonment for three months, and Lady Raleigh was excluded from the Tower.

The fame of his chemical experiments, and of his wonderful curative balsam from Guiana, had captured the public imagination. He was a necromancer, a show for gaping wonder-seekers; and the man whom in his splendour all the world had hated now became almost a popular hero in his misfortune.

In the midst of his studies and learned seclusion in 1608, a terrible new blow fell upon him. The conveyance by him of the Sherborne estates to his son and wife in 1602 had been pronounced informal in consequence of the accidental omission of some necessary words, and the crown lawyers consequently contended that the King's confirmation of Lady Raleigh and her son's possession of it was invalid, and that the estate was vested in Raleigh himself, by whose conviction it became escheated to the crown. It was proposed to Raleigh that he and his family should join in re-granting the fee-simple of the estates to the King for £8000. Raleigh knew well that such a proposal was a command. In vain he pleaded that the fee-simple did not belong to them, that they would be ruined; in vain Lady Raleigh and her children cast themselves at the King's feet, and prayed that they might not be despoiled and rendered homeless. Whether James uttered the heartless words, quoted by Carew Raleigh, popularly attributed to him, 'Na! na! I maun hae the land. I maun hae it for Car,' be true or not, it is difficult to say; but, in any case, the shameful favourite, Robert Car, obtained from his master the fine estates of which Raleigh was deprived. The £8000 to be given to Lady Raleigh for her interest was never entirely paid, but henceforward this, and a nominal pension to her of £400 irregularly paid, were the main sources of income upon which they had to depend. Raleigh wrote one of his pleading pathetic letters to the miserable creature Car, but of course in vain. He tells him that, 'after many great losses and many years of sorrow . . . it comes to my knowledge that yourself have been persuaded to give me and myne our last fatall blow, by obtaining from His Majesty the inheritance of my children and nephews, lost in law for want of wordes. This done, ther remayneth nothings with me but the bare name of life ; despoiled of all else but the grief and sorrow thereof. And for yourself, sir, seinge your daye is but now in dawne, and myne come to the eveninge, your own vertues and the King's grace assuringe you of manye good fortunes and much honour, I beseich you not to begynne your first buildings upon the ruyns of the innocent, and that their greifes and sorrows doe not attend your first plantation.' Car got the estates, but an evil fate followed them, and they changed owners eight times in as many years, until at last they fell into the hands of the Digbys, as a reward for Sir John Digby's truckling embassy to Spain. Neither spoliation nor imprisonment caused Raleigh to fall into obscurity. He was probably never more talked about than when he was in the Tower. His past magnificence was exaggerated ; his mystic labours with alembics and retorts were discussed with bated breath ; his distant travels and his Indian familiars appealed to a wonder-loving generation, and his 'great cordial,' a panacea to cure all ills, was eagerly sought for by the highest people in the land.* From the first, romantic Anne of Denmark had been fascinated by Raleigh's story, and pleaded hard with the

* No absolutely authentic recipe of the 'great cordial' is known to exist. Charles II.'s French physician, Le Febre, by command of the King, prepared a quantity of the medicine, and wrote a learned treatise on it, which was translated into English by Peter Belon. The awesome preparation as given by Le Febre is bad enough without the two extra ingredients introduced by the advice of Sir Kenelm Digby, namely, viper

King in his favour. In a great sickness—probably fever—from which she suffered, the ‘great cordial,’ it is said, saved her life, and thenceforward she became more than ever the prisoner’s friend. But she enlisted for Raleigh a much more powerful ally than herself, and one who for a time seemed to hold out promise of renewed fortune and favour to him. The most promising heir to the English crown who ever died prematurely was probably Henry Prince of Wales. Generous, enlightened and broad-minded, the young Prince gave hopes that when in the fulness of time he should succeed to his unworthy father, a new era of dignity and glory should come to England, after its partial eclipse under James. His young imagination had been captivated by Raleigh’s romantic story and misfortunes; and he had carefully examined into the details of his trial. He satisfied himself that the prisoner was no traitor, and joined his mother in constant appeals to the King for Raleigh’s pardon and release. But James could be as obstinate in some things as he was weak in others, and the young Prince indignantly, and sometimes imprudently, protested to those around him against his father’s treatment of one of flesh, with the heart and liver, and ‘mineral unicorn,’ consisting, as it does, of no less than forty herbs, roots, seeds, etc., macerated in spirits of wine and distilled, and then combined with powdered bezoar stones, pearls, red coral, deer’s horn, ambergris, musk, antimony, various sorts of earth, white sugar, and much else. It speaks much for the strength of Queen Anne’s constitution that this medicament should have cured her.

his greatest subjects. The communication thus set on foot between the Prince and the prisoner soon established a feeling of close friendship and confidence, which must have opened a new vista for Raleigh. Already, prisoner though he was, and legally dead, he sought to exert his influence on public affairs. The Prince was not, like his father, eager for an undignified alliance with an impoverished and beaten power like Spain. When in 1611 the proposal was made to marry the King's eldest daughter to the Protestant Prince Palatine, the Spanish party endeavoured to counteract it by offering a double marriage of the Prince and his sister respectively with a son and daughter of the Catholic and half Spanish Duke of Savoy. The proposal was distasteful to the English people and to the Prince himself, who consulted Raleigh about it. The prisoner wrote for the Prince's guidance two masterly State papers setting forth the undesirability of such alliances, and advocating the Protestant marriage. Once more he pointed out how Spain had been beaten into impotence, and how the proposed alliance would estrange the Hollanders and the Protestant powers. It was a dangerous line to take, for it was in opposition to the King's view. Probably Raleigh had satisfied himself now that he had nothing to hope from James, and must attach himself to the heir; but the vindictive Stuart did not forget it. The Prince was delighted with the depth of Raleigh's knowledge, and fascinated by his powerful personality. He discussed shipbuilding with him, and the prisoner wrote, for his information, The Discourse of the Invention of Ships, Observations concerning the Royal Navy and Sea Service, and other treatises of a like nature. The generous young Prince, unable to obtain his mentor's liberty, prevailed upon the King to buy Sherborne back again from Car for £20,000, and grant it to him, Henry, his intention being to reconvey it to its former possessor; and after an infinity of appeal he also wrung from his father a promise of Raleigh's release by the end of 1612. For some reason not clearly known, probably jealousy of his influence over the Prince, Raleigh fell into renewed disgrace with the Council, and Cecil, now Earl of Salisbury, gravely rebuked him. He was closely confined for three months, and deprived of the company of his wife. This was in July 1610, and Raleigh, referring to his interview with his old friend Cecil, thus speaks of him, October 1610: 'I would have bought his presence at a far dearer rate than these sharp words and these three months' close imprisonment, for it is in his Lordship's face and countenance that I behold all that remains to me of comfort, and all the hope I have.' One year and seven months after this was written the second great Cecil died, and the blow to Raleigh's hopes was a heavy one. It is true that Cecil had been the principal author of his ruin, and must have known of his innocence, that he had kept silence when a word would have saved his old friend. But still he had not been absolutely implacable, and he alone probably held the knowledge and power which would have set him free. It may well be that if Raleigh had fallen lower he would have rescued him at last, but the friendship with the Prince raised once more the possibility of Raleigh's becoming his rival, and this perhaps caused the renewed severity referred to in the letter just quoted. Raleigh had no reason to respect the memory of the false friend who had undone him, and he did not do so; but still Cecil's death made his release seem even more distant than it was before. A still greater loss was to follow six months after Cecil's death. Before Prince Henry could convey to Raleigh the estates he had obtained from Car, he fell ill of fever. All England prayed that the life of the young Prince might be spared, and the distressed mother sent to the Tower for a supply of the famous cordial that had saved her own life. It was a simple and natural act for her to do, but the physicians in attendance and the Lords of the Council gravely discussed whether the remedy, coming from so suspicious a source, should be administered. When the patient was speechless, and in articulo mortis, the cordial was placed between his lips, and gave him strength once more to speak. But it was powerless to snatch him from the grave, and the Prince finally sank (November 1612). As usual in such cases at that period there were whispers of poison. It is evident now that they were unfounded, but the Queen believed implicitly in Raleigh, and Raleigh had unfortunately said that his cordial was sovereign against everything except poison, and so she thought that her son had been sacrificed. There can have been but little love between the King and her before, but the black suspicion engendered by these doubts must have darkened still more the shadow which lay between them, for James hardly made a pretence of mourning his son. To Raleigh the blow was an irreparable one. One of the last interests of the Prince's life had been to plan his restoration to liberty and fortune, and his death for a time extinguished all hope.

The vast project of the History of the World throws into prominence perhaps more than any other thing the splendid confidence of Raleigh in his own powers. The earlier stages of the great plan were discussed with Prince Henry, and the whole work, if it had been completed, was to have been dedicated to him. But with the death of the young patron despondency seized once more upon the author, and although the work slowly progressed, it was too vast in scope, too ambitious in intention, to be carried to the end, now that the Prince had gone. There is a very doubtful story told that a few days before Raleigh's death he sent for Walter Burr, the bookseller who had published the first edition in 1614, and taking his hand asked him how it had sold. The man answered, so slowly, that it had undone him; whereupon Raleigh went to his desk, took out of it the continuation of the History to his own times, and said, with a sigh, 'Ah, friend, has the first part undone thee? The second volume shall undo no more; this ungrateful world is unworthy of it,' with which he cast the manuscript into the fire. The story is almost certainly untrue, because during the time that elapsed between the completion of the first part in 1613 and his release from the Tower there was no time for him to have concluded the work on the same scale upon which it had been commenced. There were, however, many other treatises known to have been written by him, and never printed; some of the manuscripts of which he may well have destroyed as described. The History itself, as it exists, is probably the greatest work ever produced in captivity, except Don Quixote. The learning contained in it is perfectly encyclopedic. Raleigh had always been a collector and lover of books, and had doubtless laid out the plan of the work in his mind even before his fall. He had near him in the Tower his learned friend Hariot, who was indefatigable in helping his master. Ben Jonson boasted that he had contributed to the work, and such books or knowledge as could not be obtained or consulted by a prisoner were made available by scholars like Robert Burhill, by Hughes, Warner or Hariot. Sir John Hoskyns, a great stylist in his day, would advise with regard to construction, and from many other quarters aid of various sorts was obtained. But, withal, the work is purely and entirely Raleigh's. No student of his fine, flowing, majestic style will admit that any other pen but his can have produced it. The vast learning employed in it is now, for the most part, obsolete, but the human asides, where Raleigh's personality reveals itself, the little bits of incidental autobiography, the witty, apt illustrations, will prevent the work itself from dying. To judge from a remark in the preface, the author intended at a later stage to concentrate his history mainly into that of his own country, and that the portion of the book published was to a great extent introductory. Great as were his powers and self-confidence, it must have been obvious to him that it would have been impossible for a man of his age when he began the work (59) to complete a history of the whole world on the same scale, the first six books published reaching from the beginning of the world to the end of the second Macedonian war.

In any case, the book will ever remain a noble fragment of a design, which could only have been conceived by a master mind.

If proof were wanting of how little Raleigh understood the character of James Stuart, it is furnished by the expressions employed in his eloquent preface to his History, when speaking of the punishment which inevitably falls upon unjust rulers. The whole of the preface, indeed, is directed to enforcing the lesson of the responsibility of rulers, and in combating the principle for which James lived and his son died. Especially he held up Henry VII. and Henry VIII., from whom James derived the crown, as monsters of iniquity and cruelty; and the same note is struck all through the History itself where the tyranny of kings is described. Wrong and injustice to the people may prosper for a season, but surely in the end retribution reaches the evildoer, whatever his power and exaltation. The introductory verses, written by Ben Jonson, but not acknowledged by him at the time, enforce the same lesson. The serious study of history is necessary, we are told,

‘. . . that nor the good
Might be defrauded, nor the great secured;
But both might know their ways are understood,
And the reward and punishment assured.’

No wonder the royal pedant looked sourly upon the book and said, ‘It is too saucy in censuring the acts of princes.’ Although Raleigh’s aim, both in his History and in his Prerogative of Parliament, dedicated to the King, was to show that the good of the governed must be the supreme end of government, he lost no opportunity of making clear that he was a strenuous enemy of what we now call democracy. His dislike and distrust of the populace were part of his nature, and throughout his life he took no pains to hide them. In the preface to the History he compares the multitude to barking dogs 'who accompany one another in clamour,' and, 'who wanting that virtue which we call honesty in all men, and that especial gift of God we call charity in Christian men, condemn without hearing, wound without offence given.' In speaking of the abolition of villainage in England, he says, 'Since our slaves were made free, which were of great use and service, there are grown up a rabble of rogues, cutpurses and other like trades, slaves in nature, though not in law;' and elsewhere, 'There is nothing in any state so terrible as a powerful and authorised ignorance.'

Raleigh, indeed, through all his writings, shows that his ideal of government was a just and benevolent despotism, or oligarchy. He himself was benign and equitable to his dependents, so long as they were absolutely submissive—like his Indian servants by whom he was greatly beloved—but he never wavered in his faith that the chosen few had the right to govern the many for the happiness and well-being of all.

Notwithstanding the King's strictures, the History of the World was a great success, especially amongst Puritans and the Protestant party generally. Scholars vied with each other in praising its elegance and erudition, politicians made it a text-book, and divines a basis for their homilies. Its fame and popularity were enhanced rather than diminished by rumours that hidden allusions in it to the King and modern events had caused its suppression. Public curiosity was aroused and people read the book to solve the supposed riddles it contained. A second edition was issued in 1617, and for the next hundred years it was studied as an English classic.

Through all Raleigh's misfortunes, as through his triumphs, in prison and at liberty, there ran the main idea of his life—the Colonial expansion of England. It could only be carried into effect by asserting and maintaining the superiority of England on the sea. He and his had been greatly instrumental in establishing that superiority, and his constant theme now was that the boasted Spanish power was a hollow illusion, and Spain herself a negligible quantity, because she no longer ruled the sea.

He had never lost hope or ceased effort in his colonial ventures. Kemys had been sent to Guiana in 1596, as already related, and had surveyed the coast between the Amazon and the Orinoco, the main entrance to which latter river he had discovered. No sooner had Raleigh returned to England from Cadiz in the same year than he despatched one of his ships, under Leonard Berrie, to the Guiana coast, to keep up communication with the Indians, who were for ever asking for the return of the great white chief, who had promised to defend them against the Spaniards. Again in 1604 Captain Charles Leigh was sent with 50 men to colonise, by the King's authority, some point on the Guiana coast; but the Indians sought to engage them in their inter-tribal wars, and it was considered prudent to return. They begged, however, that missionaries might be sent to teach them to pray. A Captain Harcourt, four years later, actually planted a colony at Wiapoco under the King's license, and he found that the name of Raleigh was still a power through all the region. In 1611 Sir Thomas Roe again explored the coast under the auspices of Prince Henry and Cecil, to the latter of whom he reported that 'the Spaniards were proud and insolent, yet needy and weak, that their power was only in reputation, and that they treated Englishmen worse than Moors.' Harcourt's colonists were by this time tired of their experiment, and returned with Roe. News came that the Spaniards were organising a systematic colonisation of the Orinoco, with the intention of building a great city on the banks to serve as a base for the conquest of the golden Guiana; but, said Roe, withal, 'the Spanish Government there has more skill in planting and selling tobacco, than in planting colonies.' This news redoubled Raleigh's efforts to induce his country to be beforehand with them. He had managed to interest Prince Henry in his project, and with ceaseless persistence he endeavoured from his prison to enlist the aid of people in authority for that, or for the Virginian plantation. In the latter he was successful, and in 1609 a new charter was granted to Cecil, Suffolk (Thomas Howard), and others, under the name of Treasurer and Company of Adventurers and Planters of the Colony of Virginia, which, largely by the efforts of Lord Delawarr, ended in the establishment of the permanent English colony in North America. Raleigh himself was in prison, all his former colonists had been murdered, and he obtained no benefit under the new charter; but, nevertheless, to him is due the undying glory of having made the great northern continent of America an English-speaking country. With him it was no accident. The plan sprang fully formed from his great brain. He knew that if the claim of England were not enforced, the whole of the western world would fall into the nerveless hands of Spain, and he was determined this should not be if he could help it. He was greedy of gain, but he spent his money like water in this great project. He knew full well that there was no gold to reward him; that the profit, if any, must be slow, and must accrue mainly to the nation, and not to an individual; and yet he laboured on for thirty years in the face of defeat, disaster, contumely and disgrace, in full faith and confidence that the great continent was 'by God's providence reserved for England.' If Raleigh had done no more than this he would deserve to be regarded as one of the great benefactors of the human race, but this was only one of his multitudinous activities. In his advocacy of the Guiana project he had to appeal to other motives. Here the hope of rapid gain, of abounding gold, was the bait which was to induce capitalists to adventure their money.

He knew that if gold in large quantities was found, it would be easy for him to establish the claim he had already advanced, that the whole country belonged to England, by virtue of the alleged cession made to him by the Indians in 1595. Each little expedition that was sent came back with fresh stories of golden wonders. Of the chiefs who gilded their naked bodies with glittering gold dust from head to foot, of the fabled city of Manoa, virgin yet, with wealth hitherto undreamt of in the world, of mountains of gems, of towering gods of gold. Raleigh probably believed it all himself, the whole world believed it then and for generations after ; and eager as he was for empire for his country, he knew fully the power of wealth, and he loved power of all things. So gold was to be the magnet to draw himself, as well as others, to the founding of a great English empire of Guiana. The flat plates of soft gold which were brought back by each expedition were made the most of, the richness of the gold ore smelted and refined over the furnace in the Tower garden, was exaggerated as the talk of it passed from mouth to mouth in Court and city. To any possible patron who would listen,

Raleigh appealed for help. Cecil had already lost much money in the previous expeditions and was cool. Prince Henry, on the contrary, as impulsive and ambitious for England as Raleigh himself, was sympathetic ; but his hands were tied, for his father was jealous and resented his activity. Raleigh appealed to the Queen in 1611 to patronise an expedition, and to intercede with the King to liberate him for the purpose of commanding it. Cecil was, however, not pleased that the prisoner should possess so much influence with the heir-apparent, and cast doubts upon Raleigh's intentions. It was said that, when once he got to sea he might offer his services to the King of France or the States. Raleigh protested, and proffered the most extravagant pledges for his fidelity ; but for a time without result. Then his patron, Prince Henry, died, and gloom once more temporarily fell upon him. He was old now, and ailing. He plaintively said that he knew he would gain nothing personally, for he was nearing his end ; but for the sake of England he prayed that such a rich inheritance might not be cast aside. He was still persistent and untiring in his petitions, trying to appeal to the weak side of each person he addressed. To Cecil he had held out hopes of boundless wealth, to Prince Henry, dreams of English empire. He now appealed to the Queen's pity, and to the Secretary, Sir Ralph Winwood, who was an advocate of the French alliance, he promised demonstration of the worthlessness of Spain as an ally. But sympathetic and approving as were the Queen and Winwood, they alone were not strong enough to release Raleigh, and a more powerful aid had to be enlisted. The bars that held him in the Tower, however, were weakening of themselves. His venomous foe, Northampton (Lord Henry Howard), was dead, the false friend, Cecil, was gone, and the disgraceful Car was a prisoner for murder, and had been supplanted by another favourite, more brilliant still, and, if possible, more greedy, who was always anxious to wound the Howards. In 1615, accordingly, the influence of George Villiers, afterwards Duke of Buckingham, was obtained in Raleigh's favour. It was done in much the same way that Raleigh's own aid had been procured in the days of his prosperity. George Villiers's brother, and a kinsman, were paid £750 each, and the favourite soon gained the King's ear to the tales of vast wealth to come to both of them, if Raleigh were allowed to go and re-discover the rich gold mine which Kemys had seen in 1595.

Already, three years before, Raleigh had attempted to bargain for his liberty by proposing to send Kemys to this mine, with instructions to bring away a few boatloads of ore to demonstrate its richness. The prisoner was ready then to stake his liberty and fortune on Kemys's memory. His plans in the meanwhile had developed. He now offered to realise all his property, the portion of the £8000 paid for Sherborne, and a small estate belonging to Lady Raleigh at Mitcham, and to induce his friends to furnish £5000 more; to get together somehow on his own credit £15,000, and take his expedition to the mine, coming back loaded with gold, and a new empire for the King, without assailing the Spaniards, or encroaching upon their territory. Bred in the old Elizabethan traditions that success excused most things, he doubtless held himself but lightly bound by the last condition; and Sir Ralph Winwood and other enemies of the Spanish alliance, would also look upon it as only made for the purpose of being broken, if necessary. But Raleigh always failed to understand how mean-spirited was the man who unworthily sat on the throne of great Elizabeth, and he was ready to pledge his life and all he possessed to the fulfilment of this or any other condition, which should give him the liberty for which he had yearned so long. Villiers did what for twelve years others had tried to do in vain. He aroused James's cupidity, and lulled his fears, to the extent of obtaining a warrant, dated 19th March 1616, for Raleigh 'to be permitted to go abroad to make preparations for his voyage.' The Tower gates opened, and one of the greatest prisoners they ever confined stepped out at last upon Tower Hill a free man, though still with a keeper close by his side. He was sadly aged and broken by the twelve years' cruel and unjust imprisonment to which Cecil's jealousy, Howard's hate, and James's fears, had condemned him ; but his heart beat high with hope that a new era of power for himself and his country was opening to him ; for the sufferings that had sapped the vigour of his body, had left his ambition as fierce as ever, and his vast mental energy unimpaired.

CHAPTER XIV

DIEGO SARMIENTO DE ACUÑA, COUNT DE GONDOMAR
—JAMES'S PROMISE TO HIM, ON HAND, FAITH AND WORD—POLITICAL INTRIGUES AT COURT—
THE FRENCH AND SPANISH PARTIES—FITTING OUT THE GUIANA EXPEDITION—SAILING OF
THE EXPEDITION—LANZAROTE, CANARY AND GOMERA — GONDOMAR'S EFFORTS AGAINST RALEGH

RALEGH's first enjoyment of his new freedom was to perambulate London, to note the changes that had taken place in the physical aspect of the city during his twelve years' incarceration. He must have seen much to awaken his admiration and surprise. The Strand frontage of his old palace at Durham Place was now a stately new building which rivalled the Royal Exchange in popularity. Inigo Jones had embellished Whitehall with the fine banqueting house which still stands, and the city was growing in wealth and extent on all sides. But great as may have been the material changes which met his eyes, they were trifling in comparison with the entire political revolution which had taken place in the respective positions of England and Spain towards each other. During the whole of Elizabeth's long reign she had proudly refused to recognise the pompous claims of superiority put forward by the Spaniards. She had succeeded to the throne when her country was weak and divided—when her own position was insecure—but from the first moment she scornfully rejected the patronage of Spain. As her position was consolidated, seconded by Burleigh and her sailors, she played her great game so well as to sap and paralyse the power, to which from the first she had disdained to bow, and was able to treat with hauteur, equal to his own, the King who had sought to overwhelm her with his might. By the time she died, the power of Spain was merely bluster; and, hector as Philip III. might, he was bound to sue for peace because he was impotent for war. This was the position when Raleigh had entered the Tower. When he came out it was England—or its pusillanimous prince—that was the suppliant. For want of the dignity which Elizabeth rarely lacked, James had been driven into the position of taking Spain at its own valuation, and himself assumed the inferior position, timorously anxious for an alliance with the House of Spain, which received his advances with contemptuous coolness. This changed position was to a certain extent owing to the character of the Ambassador who represented Spain in James's Court.

Don Diego Sarmiento de Acuña, afterwards Count de Gondomar, was not a haughty Castilian like Feria, Mendoza, or Frias, but one of those crafty Gallegos whose assumed clownishness of speech and boorishness of manner are often made to mask intense earnestness of purpose and boldness of action. He could, and did, play the buffoon to the King's heart's content, but under the clown's motley there was a threatening savagery that frightened James, and a pride that humiliated him. Gondomar knew exactly how far it was safe to go with James at one time. He never went beyond it, but at the next interview he started where he had left off, and carried his point further. James was as cunning and as false as any man of his time, but he was vain of his cunning, and therefore easily circumvented. Gondomar never altered in outward manner from the frank, good fellow, without guile, who said sharp, witty things, out of his abounding simplicity, and never exaggerated the power of his master, because, forsooth, he was too friendly and open to invent anything. The result was that the royal cunning rogue, who could not hide his cunning for vanity, was a simple tool in the hands of the more cunning rogue who could, and by the time that Raleigh was released Sarmiento had King James in the hollow of his hand.

Every shilling that Raleigh could realise of the wrecks of his own or his wife's former fortune was called in for employment on the Guiana expedition.

On his disastrous return he himself expressed wonder at the frenzy that had possessed him thus like a desperate gambler, to stake fortune and life on one cast. The mine on the Orinoco, it will be remembered, had been shown years before by an Indian chief to Kemys, Raleigh himself never having seen it. But he was ready, nevertheless, to risk everything on its promise of boundless wealth. His enthusiasm was catching, especially by the idle and adventurous, who were eager to join him. Most of them, said Raleigh, had never seen the seas or wars, and were a very dissolute and ungovernable crew, 'whom their friends thought it an exceedingly good gain to be discharged of at the hazard of some £40 or £50 pounds, knowing they could not have lived for a whole year so cheap at home.' But money had to be got together somehow, for Raleigh could only muster £10,000 of his own, and he was in no position to refuse contributions, even if they were hampered with such additions as those stated. There was much to be done in the first few months of his release, and the talk of the preparations soon reached the ears of Sarmiento. On the 27th April 1616, one month after Raleigh's release, he sounded his first note of alarm to the King of Spain. He expresses a wish to go to Spain in order to confer with the King personally with regard to the English maritime designs, 'especially the formation of another company for Guiana and the River Orinoco, which is near Trinidad, the prime promotor and originator of which is Sir Walter Raleigh, a great seaman, who took many prizes in the time of Queen Elizabeth, and who first colonised Virginia. I am informed that he will sail in the month of October with six or eight ships of 200 to 500 tons, some belonging to himself, some to his companions, all well provided. He will also take with him launches in which to ascend the Orinoco, and he is trying to get two ships of very light draught to take them as high up the river as possible. He has already been in the country, and assures people here that he knows of a mine that will swell all England with gold.' This was the first news sent of the proposed expedition, and with it went the Ambassador's recommendation that a great increase should be made in the strength of the Spanish navy, and that no Spanish ship should sail except with a convoy. At the same time Gondomar promised to exert his influence in London to stop the expedition. He had means for doing it which must have been staggering indeed to Englishmen who had lived in the time of Elizabeth. In his next letter, dated 20th May 1616, he relates to his King how he had dealt with the Court of Admiralty, of whose proceedings he disapproved. He says that he had complained to the King, and things were at once reformed, 'not a single pirate daring either openly or secretly to come to England.' This is how it was done, according to Gondomar: 'As the Judge of the Admiralty did not act properly, the King appointed two adjoints to my satisfaction to attend to the affairs of Your Majesty's subjects. The Judge refused to allow the adjoints to take a seat on the bench, but at my instance the King and the Lord Admiral compelled him to do so. This has caused great annoyance to those who go to Brazil for wood ; but I have prosecuted them criminally as disturbers of the peace, and have worried them so that I expect I shall upset all their designs.' And then Gondomar proceeds to say, 'I am trying to do the same with Raleigh, who . . . is secretly fitting out ships and men for an expedition to Guiana . . . but, after all, the sure and necessary thing is for us to increase our naval force, as I recommended before.'

But Gondomar, for his part, did not neglect efforts in England to frustrate Raleigh. There was no man in England now against whom the Spaniards had a deeper grudge ; there was no place where the impotence of Spain might be more glaringly demonstrated than in South America, and Gondomar left no stone unturned. Sir Ralph Winwood, the Secretary of State, was warmly in favour of Raleigh's plans ; for anything that would convince the King of the worthlessness of a Spanish alliance was welcome to him ; but the King was besotted with Gondomar and the Spanish power, Digby and Cottington were humbly negotiating in Madrid for the marriage of the Prince of Wales with the Infanta, and greedy Buckingham was bribed by the Spaniards to his heart's content.

So Gondomar had no difficulty in learning from the King and others the minutest particulars of Raleigh's plans, and taking measures to frustrate them. There had been some hesitation on the part of intended subscribers to the venture, as to the security they would have for receiving their shares of the profits, inasmuch as Raleigh was unpardoned and all his property was attachable by the crown. James was therefore moved to give a commission under the great seal to Raleigh, dated 26th August 1616, authorising him to make the voyage 'to places in South America, or elsewhere, inhabited by heathen and savage people . . . to discover some commodities, etc., profitable for our subjects, and of which the inhabitants make little or no use.' Full power is given to Raleigh to punish, reward and command his force, and to take such arms as may be necessary for defence, and the adventurers are guaranteed that the crown will not interfere with their shares of the profits; the King reserving for himself only one-fifth of all bullion and precious stones found. Before the King could be induced to grant this patent, he had insisted upon a detailed statement being furnished to him of the exact strength of the proposed expedition, its objects and destination. This information he promised on the 'word of a King' to keep absolutely secret. But it was not easy for him to keep a secret from Sarmiento. The latter assured James that he had discovered the real object of Raleigh. The talk of the mine, he said, was mere moonshine; the real intention was to prevent the close alliance between England and Spain, by attacking and destroying the shipping and possessions of the latter, and by arousing mutual enmity and distrust. James took fright at this, and assured his friend that, if Raleigh dared to attack or plunder any subjects of Spain, he would hand him over on his return to be hanged in the Plaza Mayor of Madrid, and would send every penny of plunder with him. Gondomar said this was all very well, but it would be too late when the damage was done: the force of Raleigh was too great for the mere working of a mine in a savage country, and, indeed, was meant for making piratical war on his master. James swore that it was nothing of the sort, and showed Gondomar Raleigh's secret letter, setting forth the exact number of ships and men, and the precise spot where the mine was situated. This was exactly what Gondomar wanted, and in August, as fast as a courier could speed, went a copy of Raleigh's letter to Madrid. James had insisted upon an assurance being obtained from Raleigh by Winwood, that he would really only go to his proposed gold mine, and would not encroach on the Spanish possessions; but in the patent already quoted, curiously enough, no such condition is imposed, except that the recited intention is to go to parts inhabited only by heathen people. It is not necessary to look very deeply to see here the work of Sarmiento's hand, as also in the erasure of the usual style of 'trusty and well-beloved' before Raleigh's name. Sarmiento boldly and persistently asserted that the whole of the country was Spanish territory, which James could hardly allow, as he had already given licenses for colonisation there in virtue of Raleigh's previous appropriation of it to England. But it is clear that the inclusion of the words specially warning Raleigh against encroaching upon Spanish territory in South America would have hampered Sarmiento afterwards in his claim that it was all Spanish territory, and in demanding Raleigh's punishment in any case, which was the course he intended to pursue from the first.

It must be confessed that there was a great deal of truth in the assertions of Sarmiento with regard to the underlying objects of Raleigh's expedition. The main article of its leader's political faith was that Spain should not be allowed to revive from the crushing blows she had already suffered, but should be pursued everywhere with relentless animosity, until she was past recovery. The idea of a close alliance with her was anathema to him, and to most of the statesmen who had imbibed the Elizabethan traditions. The French party of James's Court was still a considerable one; Winwood and Edmonds, Secretary and Treasurer respectively, were strongly in its favour, and all the support which Raleigh received came from the enemies of the Spanish alliance. How entirely justified Sarmiento's suspicions were in this respect is seen by the curious negotiations between Raleigh and the Savoyard Ambassador, Scarnafissi, with the knowledge of the King and the intervention of Winwood, during the period when the expedition was being prepared. For some years Savoy had been drifting away from the Spanish interest, to which for two generations it had been a faithful and ill-requited servitor. At one time there had been hopes that the Duke of Savoy might succeed to the throne of Spain, and at another that at least he might marry an Infanta, as his father had done. But his Spanish hopes had been frustrated, and the diplomacy of Henry IV. had drawn him away from his Spanish kinsman by at last ceding to him the Marquisate of Saluzzo so long in dispute, whilst the Spanish governors in Italy had, with or without orders from Madrid, encroached upon his territories, led him into a war, and caused him endless trouble. A greater danger than ever threatened the little potentate now, for the Spanish policy of Marie de Medici, the Queen-Mother of France, had drawn the two great rivals together; and this boded but ill to their small neighbour. The Huguenots and Constable Lédiguières were favourable to him, and a project was conceived to form a new combination of the Protestant powers, the Huguenots and Savoy, to withstand the threatening combination of France and Spain. In furtherance of this idea, Count Scarnafissi was sent to England. He was brought into contact with Raleigh, to whom such a combination would be sure to appeal, and submitted to James a proposal for Raleigh's expedition, reinforced by four of the King's ships and others, to change the route as soon as they got out to sea, and join a force in the Mediterranean under the Duke of Montpensier, for the purpose of surprising and capturing Genoa—which was in the Spanish interest—for the Duke of Savoy. It was a bold project, and Winwood and Raleigh approved of it highly. James pretended to do so; talked of arming sixteen ships to join Raleigh's eight, and much more to the same effect, but when matters came to a point he grew cool, and told Scarnafissi that on no account would he allow Raleigh to take command, as he was determined that he should go to the Indies. The Venetian Ambassador, whose account we are following, says that the real reasons why the King would not let Raleigh undertake the enterprise were, that he did not want to offend the Spaniards, and because in case of the attempt succeeding he could not trust Raleigh to give him a fair proportion of the profits. 'But, I believe,' says the Venetian, 'that as soon as he (Raleigh) has his ships out of the river, he will rather go to the Mediterranean than the Atlantic; because he has spent 200,000 ducats in fitting out eight vessels; he is deeply in debt, and very few people believe that he means to return to England, but will take to plundering, perhaps indifferently. He pretends to be willing to obey and go to the Indies, for if he appeared otherwise he would be ruined, but what he will do when he is once out at sea, time alone will show.' This was at the end of January 1617, and the Genoa enterprise was then seen to be hopeless, as its success depended upon the prompt utilisation of Raleigh's ships. Raleigh's new flagship, the Destiny, was launched in the Thames in January, and for a time was the talk of London, for it was built on his own improved design, and its furnishing was as luxurious and splendid as befitted its owner's tastes. Amongst other persons who went on board to see it was Des Marets, the French Ambassador, to whom Raleigh had already been introduced by Winwood. Des Marets' first visit was in March, and on that day and subsequently he had conferences with Raleigh. It was the ill fortune of the latter, apparently, to impress all contemporaries with his insincerity and want of principle. He had ventured almost his last penny, had staked his reputation, practically his life, in the Guiana enterprise, to which he had clung for years through all his troubles, and yet there were few people believed that he honestly intended to carry it out. Des Marets thought that he might be going to aid the Huguenots, who were in open rebellion against the Queen-Mother's Spanish policy, and sought to draw him out for the information of Richelieu, whose public life as minister had just commenced.

Thereupon ensued certain negotiations which have never yet been satisfactorily explained. Winwood was anxious to combine France with England, and to avoid close union with Spain; and whatever was done by Raleigh with the French at this juncture must have been known to him, and partly also to James, although Raleigh alone had to suffer for it at a subsequent stage. Des Marets reported that Raleigh had told him that he had a great enterprise in hand, 'which would bring great honour and profit to the sovereign who shall reap the fruit of his labours. Seeing himself so badly and tyrannously treated by his King, he had resolved, if God sent him good fortune, to quit his country, and make to the King our master the first offer of that which falls into his hands. . . . I did my best to confirm him in this good intention, and assured him that he could not possibly address himself to any quarter where he would be received with greater courtesy or friendship. I thought best to give him fair words, although, for my own part, I do not expect his voyage will result in much profit.' It does not appear that this alleged strange avowal of Raleigh to the French Ambassador produced any further direct negotiations, although, as we shall see later, one of the officers of the French Embassy was afterwards accused of carrying on communications with Raleigh of a questionable character. It is certain that before he finally sailed Raleigh opened up a correspondence with the Admiral of France, Montmorenci, for the purpose of obtaining a patent allowing him to enter any French ports with whatever prizes he may have captured, and that he made arrangements for a number of French ships to join him on the Orinoco. When Raleigh returned to England, the King told Gondomar that Raleigh asserted that he had taken possession of Guiana by virtue of warrants granted by Queen Elizabeth and Henry IV. of France. It is unlikely that he should have obtained a patent from Henry for his first voyage, so that, if the King (James) told the truth, Raleigh had probably obtained a transfer to him of the patent granted by Henry IV. to Henry Maree de Montbariot and others, many years before, for the conquest of Guiana, or else that he had in some way associated with him the holders of the patent, with whom it is known that he carried on a correspondence. In any case, the best proof that Raleigh never intended to offer his services to France to the detriment of his own country, is afforded by the fact that he actually did return to England, when he must have known that his return meant ruin, and perhaps death, which he could have avoided by taking refuge in a French port. The balance of probability seems to be that Raleigh in this expedition was used merely as a pawn in the game, respectively by the French and Spanish parties in the English Court, with the full knowledge of the King, to be accepted or repudiated, as circumstances rendered advisable. He was a man whom nobody trusted; and yet, such is the irony of events, that he was almost the only man who was perfectly single-hearted and sincere in his intentions for the expedition. Similar expeditions under Elizabeth were often bound by the most stringent conditions from offending Spain, and yet it was perfectly understood that the conditions might be ignored with safety, so long as the nation was relieved of responsibility. Raleigh never doubted for a moment that the same course would be followed now. He knew—everybody knew—that he would probably have to fight the Spaniards before he effected a permanent settlement in Guiana. Gondomar was quite right when he told the King that so large a force could only mean fighting; and he offered that if Raleigh would consent to go unarmed, with two ships only, the King of Spain himself would give him an escort and protect his working of the mine. It suited all English parties that he should go in strength, and be exalted or sacrificed, as might be convenient, on his return; and most men of position saw it but himself. He was too deeply absorbed in the great dream of his life to see anything but the vast golden empire of Guiana beckoning him and his to wealth untold, and to undying fame as a man who had endowed his country with the mighty dominion of El Dorado. By the middle of March 1617, Raleigh's preparations in the

Thames were complete, and a survey of his ships was made by order of the Lord Admiral, of which the following is a copy :—

‘The Destiny of London, of the burthen of 440 tons, whereof Sir Walter Rauleigh goeth generall, Walter Rauleigh the younger captaine, Robert Barwick master, 200 men, whereof 100 saylers, 20 watermen, 80 gentlemen, the rest servants and labourers, 36 pieces of ordnance. The Starre, alias the Jason of London, of the burthen of 240 tons, John Pennington captain, George Clevingham master, 80 men, 1 gentleman and no more, 25 pieces of ordnance. The Encounter of London, of the burthen of 160 tons, Edward Hastings captain, Thomas Pye master, 17 pieces of ordnance. The John and Francis, alias the Thunder, of the burthen of 150 tons, Sir William St Leger Kt. captaine, William Gurden master, 60 souldiers, 10 landsmen, 6 gentlemen, 20 pieces of ordnance. The Flying Joane of London, of the burthen of 120 tons, John Chidley captaine, William Thorne master, 25 men, 14 pieces of ordnance. The Husband, alias the Southampton, of the burthen of 80 tons, John Bayley captaine, Philip Fabian master, 25 mariners, 2 gentlemen, 6 pieces of ordnance. The pinnace Page, James Barker captaine, Stephen Selbye master, 8 saylers, 3 robinets of brasse.

‘Sum total. 1215 tons. Men 431. Ordnance 121 pieces.

‘The number of men on the Encounter is not stated.’

This report was duly sent to Philip, but one of the Spanish spies at Plymouth subsequently reported that when the expedition finally sailed it consisted in all of 17 ships, 14 of which were armed, carrying a force of 2000 men. The real strength, however, that sailed from Plymouth was 14 ships in all, with about 900 men. Troubles and delays innumerable occurred before Raleigh could leave England behind him. He put out of the Thames at the end of March 1617, and awaited his stragglers at the Isle of Wight. After he reached Plymouth, the victuallers refused to supply biscuits for the Jason without payment, and Lady Raleigh in London was obliged to enter into a bond for the money. Then Sir John Ferne, the captain of the Flying Hart, could not sail without a fresh supply of money, and Raleigh had to borrow £200 from two friends. Captain Whitney’s ship, too, ran short of provisions, and Raleigh’s plate was sold to the Plymouth silversmiths to pay for them; and so three months wore away in heart-breaking inactivity, provisions dwindling, money running short and men grumbling. In May the commander issued a general order for the government of the fleet, which is curiously reminiscent of the order issued by Medina Sidonia on the sailing of the Armada, and in parts is evidently inspired by it. Divine service was to be performed every morning and evening on all the ships ; there was to be no swearing, blasphemy or gaming on board ; landsmen were to learn the names of the ropes, and sailors the use of arms, and so on ; but the most important parts for our present purpose are the elaborate directions given for fighting at sea, and the frequent reference to 'the enemy' ; quite in the old Elizabethan vein. Considering that England was then ostensibly at peace with all Europe, and the expedition was supposed to be bound for a country to which no nation laid claim but Spain, it is evident that Raleigh had not the slightest doubt from the first that he would probably have to fight, and that the enemy could only be the Spaniards. For James or others to plead ignorance of it was sheer hypocrisy ; although the King gave 'his hand, word and faith' to Gondomar that if the Spaniards were assailed in any way Raleigh should die, and exacted heavy sureties from some of his friends in England that he (Raleigh) would return and answer for his conduct of the expedition. Raleigh sailed from Plymouth on the 4th July, but off Scilly was caught in a tempest which sank Chidley's pinnace, and scattered the rest of the fleet. Thereafter for seven weary weeks the unfortunate expedition remained wind-bound in Cork harbour, and on the 19th August, nearly five months after he had left the Thames, Raleigh finally spread his sails to a fair north-east wind, and started on his fateful voyage.

SKETCH MAP OF GUIANA

C. PALEGH'S TWO VOYAGES.

On the 30th, 20 leagues from Cape St Vincent, the expedition fell in with four suspicious French ships, loaded with fish and train oil. Raleigh's captains wanted to persuade him to capture them as pirates, but he told them it was not his right to examine the subjects of the French King, and it was legal for them to capture Spanish ships south of the Canaries and west of the Azores, and: 'I did not suffer my company to take from them any pennyworth of their goods, greatly to the discontent of my company, who cried out that they were men-of-war and thieves, as so indeed they were, for I met a Spaniard afterwards whom they had robbed.' A pinnace of 7 tons and three pipes of oil were bought of them for 61 crowns, and they were, after some prudent detention, sent on their way un plundered. On Sunday the 7th September the English expedition anchored off Lanzarote, one of the Canary Islands. The Moorish pirates had recently been in the neighbourhood, and the people of the island thought that Raleigh's fleet might be they, so that when some of the Englishmen landed 'to stretch their legs,' the islanders came down to the beach fully armed, but carrying a flag of truce. When they found that they had to deal with Englishmen, they requested that two officers, armed only with rapiers, might be sent to confer with the Governor. Raleigh, and an officer named Bradshaw, advanced into a plain for the purpose, and the leader was appealed to by the Governor as to what he wanted in so poor and barren a place, peopled mainly by Moriscos. He told him that he had no desire to injure any of the King of Spain's dominions, having received from his King express orders to the contrary. All he wanted was to be allowed to purchase at a fair price such fresh provisions as the place afforded. The Governor promised him facility for this. As agreed, a list of the stores he required was sent on shore, but Raleigh waited in vain for the provisions to be sent, the Governor in the meanwhile forwarding to him fresh promises of immediate supplies. Raleigh says that he never believed him, for he knew he was carrying his goods up to the mountains in the interior, and the English captains were all for attacking the town, but, says Raleigh, 'I knew it would offend His Majesty, and the poor English merchant whose goods were in their hands would have been ruined.' After waiting for some days, Raleigh sent word to the Governor, that if it were not that he did not wish to offend the King of England he would pull him and his Moriscos out of the town by the ears. It is not surprising that in response to this the Governor said he knew they were the same Turks that had been plundering their neighbours, and he would consequently stand on his guard against them. Even if they were English, he said, he should be hanged if he helped them, and they should have nothing except by force. Raleigh, before he sailed away, sent a curt answer to this, saying that he took note of the King of Spain's disposition, notwithstanding the peace with England. The next day the expedition reached Grand Canary, and Raleigh sent a copy of his correspondence with the Governor of Lanzarote to the Governor-in-Chief, and landed a few of his men to obtain fresh water. Whilst this was proceeding some of the country people attacked the English sentries, and in the ensuing skirmish three of the islanders were killed ; ‘which,’ says Sir Walter, ‘made up for two of his own men’ who were killed in a brawl at Lanzarote.

As we have seen, the long delay in the sailing of the expedition had given ample time for the Spaniards to make preparations to frustrate the aims in view. Several agents of Gondomar had shipped with Raleigh, in order to report anything which, by any possibility, might furnish a pretext for demanding of James the fulfilment of his promise, on ‘hand, word and faith,’ to surrender Raleigh if any offence were offered to Spain, and this landing on the Canaries to water was thought to be enough. Captain Bailey, with the Husband, deserted, and flew to England with the news. He at once sent his statement to Buckingham, as agreed upon, by whom it was handed to the King, and from him to Fenton for inquiry and report. In the meanwhile Gondomar was fully informed of what had passed, and sent the following letter to the King of Spain (22nd Oct.). As the particulars in it have not hitherto been published, I have thought well to transcribe it nearly at length. ‘I informed Your Majesty on the 3rd August that Walter Raleigh had arrived in Ireland short of stores, and that an English baron there had provided him with 100 oxen, etc. He sailed on the 19th August, having added to his fleet there some little craft of 20 or 30 tons each. He is said to have in all 13 or 14 sail, and 900 or 1000 men, soldiers and sailors. I now learn that letters have been received here from some of the men who went with him, and particularly from the chief gunner of his flagship, written from the Canary Islands, where they say he had tried to get some water and stores. I expect he will do more injury than that there if he can. No doubt news of his actions will arrive in Spain more speedily and frequently than here, and as all possible efforts have been made here, without avail, to prevent his voyage, whatever measures Your Majesty may adopt to punish him will be fully justified, and many honourable Englishmen will be very glad of it. Amongst these is Sir John Digby,* for he protested here frequently and vigorously against the evils which would arise to England if Walter Raleigh were allowed to go on this voyage. I have also asked the folks here what right they have to complain of pirates, since they let this man sail, who has no other intention than to be a pirate. If he has stolen so much as a cow at

* Sir John Digby, Raleigh's successor in the possession of the Sherborne estate, was sent as English convoy to Madrid to treat of the marriage of Prince Charles and the Infanta. He, Cottington, and Lord Roos were ceaselessly urged by Philip and Lerma to write to James I., pressing for the condign punishment of Raleigh.

Canary, it would be well for the Governor to seize the goods of the first English ship which goes there, in order to fully satisfy the owners. It would be a great shame if he did not do so, and tell the captain, if he complains, that he had better come and recover the damage from Raleigh's sureties, as it is easier for an Englishman to make a claim in London than a Canarian.

'Since writing the above I have received the paper I enclose. It is from a person very zealous in Your Majesty's interests, and I also send the paper from Sir Thomas Lake, who came personally to express to me the great sorrow of the King and all good people at what Raleigh has done. The King promises that he will do whatever we like to remedy and redress it. Although I judge Lake to be a very honest man, and sincere in what he says, I look upon it as absurd to expect that a fitting redress will be afforded here for so atrocious a wickedness as this, as I clearly foresaw and foretold what would happen in ample time to prevent it, and urgently pressed the King and Council frequently to do so, and also Secretary Winwood, who really was Raleigh's supporter. One day, when the King wanted to persuade me of the perfect security Raleigh was leaving that he would do no harm, I said I would call him to witness that if Raleigh sailed I knew that he would proceed in such a manner as would force Your Majesty's officers to embargo the persons and property of Englishmen in your dominions.

He replied that it would be very just to do so if Raleigh did anything wrong, but that I should see that he (the King) would not deceive himself to the extent of imperilling the persons and property of his subjects, or permit Raleigh to go, unless he left security.

Captain Bailey, who has returned from Raleigh, declares that the latter approached Canary, and the Governor sent to say that Your Majesty was at peace with the King of England, and if he required provisions, he could have them and welcome. Seeing that the people there were prepared for him, he went to another island of which the captain is not quite sure of the name, but believes it to be Lanzarote, where he landed 600 men with the intention of fortifying himself, and awaiting the Indian flotilla. The captain says that he had sailed with him, under the belief that his intention was to discover unknown countries, but when he saw his evil objects he returned hither to the Isle of Wight, where he now is, and has sent this news. Raleigh's friends are greatly perturbed, and are trying to find excuses for him. Amongst other absurdities they are saying that he bore a commission from the King of France to make war on Your Majesty at sea.'

Gondomar's urgent advice to Philip then follows. Let the authorities at Seville—as if of their own motion—draw up a statement that an English fleet bearing the King's commission has raided the Canaries, and that, pending Your Majesty's orders, they have embargoed all English property there (i.e., at Seville). This, he says, will soon bring James to his knees, but he will be very insolent if it be not done. ‘Pray,’ he says to Philip, ‘send the fleet to punish this pirate.’ It will be easy, as his force is small. Every man caught should at once be killed, except Raleigh and the officers, who should be brought to Seville, and executed in the Plaza the next day. It is the only way to treat such pirates and disturbers, and it is a necessary step for the preservation of the peace with England, France and Holland. Gondomar also relates that the Earl of Southampton had received a letter from Raleigh from Canary, saying that he had decided that the best thing to do would be to await there the arrival of the silver fleet, and that he, some French ships having joined him, is now so strong, that none of the Spanish ships will escape him. ‘I am certain,’ says Gondomar, ‘that no redress is to be expected from here; because those who might redress the evil would, in my opinion, rather see the millions of the silver fleet in Raleigh’s hands than in those of Your Majesty. I have constantly urged upon Your Majesty the course I think you should take. Raleigh sailed with the King’s commission to command the expedition, in spite of all my remonstrances and protests, and those of his better councillors, and after he had often given me his word that Raleigh should leave such security as would prevent him from injuring any of Your Majesty’s subjects. He sent to tell me this a hundred times by several councillors and by Sir John Digby. The King should now be made to feel the responsibility. It is certain that the King does not wish for war.'

I have reproduced this letter at length, because it proves beyond doubt that the intention of the Spaniards from the first was to sacrifice Raleigh, and that the moment the King was weak and foolish enough to pledge himself to Gondomar that if the least injury was done to Spanish subjects he should be sacrificed, Raleigh was doomed. Be it remembered that when the above letter was written, no attack whatever had really been made upon Spanish interests, and that Bailey's assertions were absolutely untrue. The letter written by Sir Thomas Lake to Gondomar, enclosed to the King of Spain, in Spanish, contains the following expressions, which display even more luridly the miserable weakness of James, considering that when they were written there was nothing against Raleigh but the utterly false and unsupported suppositions of Captain Bailey. 'I return you the letter you did me the honour of writing to me, and I am glad to be able to transmit to you the account of the matter I have just received in a letter from Viscount Fenton, respecting Raleigh's business, and his action in Canary. He tells me that His Majesty is very disposed and determined against Raleigh, and will join the King of Spain in ruining him, but he wishes this resolution to be kept secret for some little while, in order that, in the interim, he may keep an eye on the disposition of some of the people here. If Your Excellency is willing, I will call and see you tomorrow. 21st October.—THOMAS LAKE.'

The evidence which was enough to make James willing to 'ruin' his most distinguished subject seemed to the English Ambassador, Cottington, in Madrid to need further proofs, and every unbiased person will now come to the same conclusion. The probability seems to be, that James was eager to seize upon the first pretext to sell Raleigh to the Spaniards, in order to curry favour with them.

Captain Bailey and his crew were brought to London, and examined by the King himself, who told Gondomar 'that the statements of one half of them were opposed by those of the other half; some saying that Raleigh had done nothing wrong, whilst others asserted that he was a great pirate, confirming Captain Bailey's own statement. He (the King) told me he wished we had some trustworthy news from Spain, because he was anxious to proclaim Raleigh at once as a traitor, and proceed against his sureties, and against all those who took part in the voyage. He said that during this week he would make some demonstration, which would please me, and would bridle and alarm his subjects; and that Sir John Digby was the person who had spoken most worthily to him on the matter.

When he was opposing Raleigh's being allowed to sail, he had told him (the King) that if the voyage were not prevented great evils would ensue, and all the world would throw the blame upon the King (James). He (Digby) said, if the King wished to break with Your Majesty, he would undertake to find a pretext of a more honourable description than this. The King said that he saw now that Digby had told him the truth, and he would at once adopt such measures of redress as Your Majesty wished and would convey to him through me.'

These letters, which have never hitherto been published, prove to demonstration James' complaisant baseness in the matter; and that Raleigh was a doomed man, even if the subsequent events on the Orinoco had never happened. But as month succeeded month, whilst no fresh news came of Raleigh's misdeeds, and the slow administration in Spain took no open measures of retaliation, Raleigh's friends plucked up spirits. They pointed out if Bailey's statements or suppositions had been true the results would have been seen before, and resentment would have been shown in Madrid. In the absence of Gondomar, Father Fuentes writes from London (2nd February 1618), that the King would be very glad now of an opportunity of punishing those who promoted Raleigh's voyage, and the writer recommends that Digby in Madrid be requested to urge the making of some great demonstration in England. 'Digby,' he says, 'would be more delighted than anyone; but as no representations are made in Madrid, Raleigh's friends are saying that nothing wrong has been done, and that Bailey is a liar.'

On the 4th September Raleigh arrived at Gomera, one of the smaller Canary Islands. His men were falling sick with overcrowding, heat, and bad water; and a fresh supply of the latter was of vital necessity. There was only one small landing-place, which a handful of men could defend against a host, and a few shots were fired against the English from the rocks above it. Twenty demi-culverin balls were sent through the houses of the town by the English, just to show that the expedition was well armed, and then Raleigh sent a peaceful message to the Governor, saying he only wanted water, and would do no harm unless attacked. The Governor had been advised that they were Moorish pirates, and hesitated; but some Canarians, whom Raleigh had taken on the coast of Africa, were sent to reassure him, and an agreement was made for a few of the Englishmen to land and obtain a supply of water. Only six men went ashore, but ten of Raleigh's vessels were put broadside on the town, which, he said, he would knock to bits if treachery were practised on his men. He had nothing to fear, however. The Governor's wife was half an Englishwoman—her mother was a Stafford—to whom Raleigh sent six fine handkerchiefs, and six pairs of gloves, welcome, doubtless, in that remote place. But not more welcome than were her gracious kindly words and presents in return. It was almost the only pleasant occurrence in this disastrous voyage, this friendly interchange of courtesies at Gomera. 'She sent,' says Raleigh, 'four very great loaves of sugar, a basket of lemons, which I much desired to comfort and refresh our many sick men, a basket of oranges, a basket of most delicate grapes, another of pomegranates and figs, which trifles were better welcome to me than 1000 crowns would have been.' In reply he sent the Countess '2 ounces of ambergris, an ounce of delicate extract of amber, a great glass of rose water in high estimation here, a very excellent picture of Mary Magdalen, and a cutwork ruff.' It would perhaps be indiscreet to ask where Puritan Sir Walter had obtained the picture of the Magdalen; but whatever he may have plundered elsewhere, all things at Gomera were sacred, and he threatened his men with instant death if so much as a pennyworth were taken without due payment. Before he sailed he received plenty more of refreshing fruit, a basket of fine white manchet (bread), and two dozen fat hens, with a full supply of good water. 'And we departed without any offence given or received to the value of a farthing, whereof the Count sent his friar aboard my ship, with a letter to Don Diego de Sarmiento, Ambassador in England, witnessing how nobly we had behaved ourselves, and how justly we had dealt with the inhabitants of the island.' The good Governor little knew that Don Diego and James Stuart between them had already agreed to 'ruin' the greatest Englishman afloat for daring to sail the seas at all, whether his conduct was good or ill. Releasing the small Spanish prizes he had detained, and recompensing the masters, he departed from Gomera on the 21st September, with mutual expressions of kindness and goodwill. Head winds and tempests kept him buffeting about in the Atlantic for six weeks, in danger from shipwreck again and again, with pestilence raging on his fleet, until it seemed as if ill-fortune had marked out Raleigh as its own. On his flagship, the Destiny, he had threescore men sick at the same time, and no less than forty-two died on the terrible passage. Water fell short, the heat was stifling, and when the head winds fell, a dead calm held them motionless on seas like burnished copper; and then a mysterious darkness overwhelmed them so that for two whole days they had to steer by candlelight. At length, on the 31st October, the leader was aroused from his sweltering couch by a sudden hurricane, and rushing on deck, he too caught a chill, and was soon down with a raging fever. Overwrought with anxiety and fatigue, he was like to die for many weary days, sustained only, as he says, by the grateful fruit which the Countess of Gomera had sent him; and when at last, on the 11th November, the welcome cry of 'land' was heard, weak and helpless as a child he could only gaze sadly from his pallet upon the first promontory of the great empire with which it was the dream of his life to endow the English crown.

CHAPTER XV

RALEGH IN GUIANA — THE RIVER EXPEDITION—ATTACK ON SAN THOMÉ—DEATH OF YOUNG WALTER RALEGH—FAILURE AND RETURN OF THE RIVER EXPEDITION—GONDOMAR CLAIMS THE FULFILMENT OF THE KING'S PROMISE—HIS CON-VERSATIONS WITH JAMES

THE point first sighted was Cape Wiapoco—now Cape Orange—east of the mouth of the Cayenne. Raleigh's name was well known there amongst the Indians, one of the chiefs in the neighbourhood, Leonard, having lived in England with him. Harcourt's company of Englishmen a few years before had been succoured and aided by the Indians there, in the belief that they were Raleigh's men. Leonard, however, was up the country when the expedition arrived, and Raleigh decided not to seek him, but to enter the mouth of the Cayenne, where there lived another chief called Harry, who had passed two years in the Tower with the leader. Cassava bread, luscious pines and fresh meat, came in plenty from the devoted Indians. Raleigh was carried ashore, 'out of the unsavoury ship, pestered with many sick men, which, being unable to move, poisoned us with a most filthy stench,' and here, sitting under the shade of a tent, he gradually began to gather strength. His men were landed and refreshed, his boats cleaned, and for a time affairs looked prosperous. One of his captains, Alley, was troubled with vertigo, and it was decided to send him home with dispatches, giving the good news that the Guiana coast had been reached at last. Raleigh wrote by him to his wife (14th Nov.). 'Sweetheart,—I can yet write unto you, but with a weak hand, for I have suffered the most violent calenture for fifteen days that ever man did, and lived: but God that gave me strong heart in all my adversities hath also now strengthened it in the hell fire of heat. We have had two most grievous sicknesses in our ship, of which fourtie-two have died, and there are yet many sick; but having recovered the land of Guiana this 12th November, I hope we shall recover them. We are yet 200 men, and the rest of our fleet are reasonably strong—strong enough I hope to perform what we have undertaken, if the diligent care at London to make our strength known to the Spanish King by his Ambassador have not taught the Spaniards to fortifie all the entraunces against us. Howsoever, we must make the adventure, and if we perish, it shall be no honour for England, nor gain for His Majestie, to loose, among many other, one hundred as valiant gentlemen as England hath in it. . . . To tell you that I might be here King of the Indians were a vanitie; but my name hath still lived among them. Here they feed me with fresh meat, and all that the country yields; all offer to obey me.'

Alley arrived at Portsmouth in March, and the Spanish Ambassador was promptly ready with his version of the news to send to Madrid. The expedition, he said, was in dire straits, in a port where the current was so strong that it would be difficult for the ships to get out. Provisions were running short, and—which was true—the mortality had been terrible. 'Most of the men on board are desperate, and some of them gave letters for their friends in England to the captain who has come hither. But Raleigh took the letters, and, amongst others complaining of his proceedings, he opened one from a gentleman, saying in what misery they were, and that if things did not improve they had resolved to throw Raleigh overboard and return to England. Raleigh attempted to arrest this gentleman, and showed him his letter; but the rest of them would not allow it. All those who have come hither agree that nothing but entire failure can be expected from Raleigh's voyage, and they think that those who remain with him will either be lost, or, if they are able to get out, will turn pirates. I think this is the most likely.'

After three weeks stay at Cayenne, and great danger in crossing the bar, Raleigh's ship and the Jason sailed higher up the coast to the Triangle Isles—or Health Isles, as they are now called. But the rest of his fleet lagged behind on various pretexts. Indeed, though Raleigh himself does not say so, it is plain that most of his men were already sulky and discontented. At the Isles of Health, the expedition up the Orinoco was organised. The chief had again fallen sick, and could not personally take command; the officers, moreover, were unwilling to leave the body of the expedition on the coast at the mercy of the Spaniards, unless Raleigh himself remained in charge. Sir Warham St Leger, the second military officer, was also down with fever, and the 400 soldiers, with the river force, were placed under the command of Sir Walter's nephew, George Raleigh, with Captains Parker, North, young Walter Raleigh, Thornehurst, Hall and Chudley under him, Captain Kemys, the only man who had seen the mine, having command of the landing in the river. The Encounter, the Confidence, the Supply and two small craft were directed to take these men to the mouth of the Orinoco, calling at the Rivers Surinam and Essequibo for refreshment on the way, Raleigh and the rest of the fleet directing their course to Trinidad to await the return of the party.

They parted company on the 10th December, the instructions to the river expedition being that, if possible, they were to reach the mine without coming into conflict with the Spaniards. The soldiers were to encamp

‘between the Spanish town and the mine if there be any town. So that being secured, you may make trial what depth and breadth the mine holds, and whether or no it answers your hopes. If you find it royal, and the Spaniards make war upon you, you, George Raleigh, are to repel them, if it be in your power, and to drive them as far as you can.’

When James Stuart found it necessary afterwards to make some apology to his indignant people for having sacrificed Raleigh to please the Spaniards, he—or rather, Bacon for him—asserted, untruly, that orders were given beforehand to the exploring party to capture the Spanish town before going to the mine, but all testimony contradicts this; besides which, Raleigh did not know where the town was.

The main fleet, with Raleigh on board, sighted Barima Point, at the mouth of the Orinoco, on the 15th December, and finally came to anchor in the Gulf of Paria, Trinidad, on the last day of the year 1617. On the 19th January an attempt was made to trade with the Spaniards at Port of Spain, but a volley of musketry, and other volleys of stones and oaths from shore, bade the English keep at a distance. The river expedition had taken stores for a month, and when the month of January had passed without news of it, Raleigh began to grow anxious. He had moved up to the north point of Trinidad to await the return of his absent men—for on this occasion the exploration party had entered by the main mouth of the river discovered by Kemys, and not by the Manamo, by which Raleigh had groped his way in 1595—and continued to send scouting parties along the coast to the east to pick up news. At last, from unwilling Indians, vague rumours came that the English had captured a Spanish town in the Orinoco and had slain the officers, the rest of the Spaniards having fled to the woods, two of the English captains also having fallen. Armed parties were despatched by Raleigh daily to gather news, and gradually, piece by piece, Raleigh, in dire anxiety, began to realise that some great calamity had fallen upon him.

In the meanwhile we will follow, for a time, the fortunes of the river expedition, as told by some of the men who took part in it. Let Captain Parker tell his story first to his old comrade Captain Alley.

‘Your departure from us was fortunate for you, as you thereby avoided miseries and crosses unutterable. We left Cayenne for the Orinoco in company with the ships of Captains Whitney and Wollaston, a flyboat and a caravel; the flagship, vice flagship and the other larger vessels directing their course for Trinidad to await our return. We were a month ascending the Orinoco, and at length landed a league from San Thomé. At one o’clock in the morning we delivered our assault, and lost Captain Rauley and Captain Cosmore, although Captain Rauley was killed by his own carelessness and indiscreet rashness, as you will be told, for I wish to give you an account of the order that was observed by us. Captain Cosmore led the forlorn hope with 50 men, I followed with the first companies of musketeers, and Rauley came after me with the pikemen. As soon as Rauley learned that we had delivered the assault, he indiscreetly abandoned his post and command, and came to us, where, unfortunately, he was welcomed with a bullet which left him no time to beg our Almighty Father for mercy for the sinful life he had led. We at once took possession of the town, with only a loss of two of our men, one of whom was Master Harrington, a kinsman of the Countess of Bedford. The Spaniards were not strong, and being suspicious of our force, fled, abandoning their Governor, who is called Don Diego Palomeque de Acuña, with Captain Santo and Captain Abisueto. When we had the town in our hands, Captain Kemys took several gentlemen with him to find the mine, and in this way passed carelessly from one place to another for about twenty days, always holding out hopes to us that he would find it. But at last we discovered that it was all nothing but lies and deceit, and that he was a mere Machiavel who told the truth to no one; and especially was he hateful and detestable to himself, for with the most roguish cruelty he sought to take his own life and succeeded in killing himself. But now he can do no more wickedness, I will not dwell further upon this man, odious and detestable to God and the world. I will, however, inform you, as well as I can, what those of us who remain may expect. We have already split into several parties. Captains Whitney and Wollaston agree together to sail in company on the seas, to waylay homeward-bound merchant ships; the flagship, vice flagship and Sir John Ferne, are going to Newfoundland to lay in fresh provisions, and thence to the western isles also to watch for homeward-bound ships. As for myself, with God's help, I also mean to make some voyage that will either give me profit or a grave in the sea. Pray, therefore, tell my friends this. I expect by the end of August that we shall have finished our intentions. As I am in port, I cannot write more, and I only pray to God that you may live prosperously. 22d March.*

This not particularly chivalrous epistle is somewhat in conflict with Raleigh's own accounts, which always represent the Spaniards as the first aggressors. When Kemys had ascended the Orinoco previously (in 1596) he had found the Spanish settlement San Thomé, as already described, somewhat below the mouth of the Caroni, the mine itself being a considerable distance below that point, near Mount Aio. Raleigh had heard from the

* There is copy of Parker's letter in the Harl MSS. xxxix., folio 342, of which the wording varies somewhat from the above, although the sense is of course the same. This is owing to the fact that the above version is a retranslation into English of the Spanish copy sent to Philip III. by Gondomar.

Indians at Cayenne, if not before, that the settlement had been moved, but appears to have had no exact knowledge of the position of the new town. His instructions to Kemys before the departure of the expedition make this clear, as he tells him to land his men and encamp them between the town and the mine, if there be any town near. 'If you shall find any great number of soldiers . . . and that the passages are already forced, so as without manifest peril of my son, yourself, and the other captains, you cannot pass towards the mine, then be well advised how you land, for I know (a few gentlemen excepted) what a scum of men you have, and I would not for all the world receive a blow from the Spaniard to the dishonour of our nation.'

Raleigh's own accounts in his Apology, and in his letters to Winwood and his wife, explain the matter in a different light. By them it would appear that the Indians opposite the Isle of Tortola sent word to the Spaniards of the coming of the expedition; and that as they approached the new settlement, which was on the site now called Guayana Vieja, slightly below the site of the mine, the Spaniards shot at the boats, 'both with their ordnance and muskets, whereupon the companies were forced to charge them, and soon beat them out of the town. In the assault whereof, my son (having more desire of honour than of safety) was slayne, with whom to say the truth all respect of the world hath taken an end in me.'

Raleigh, in the bitterness of his heart, writing this to

Winwood (who was dead when the letter arrived), complains that the King valued him so little as to allow full particulars and charts of his projected voyage to be sent to Spain by Gondomar, and gives particulars of the orders sent from Madrid to America for the attack and defeat of the expedition. 'Lastly,' he says, 'to make an apology for not working the mine, although I know not (His Majesty excepted) whom I am to satisfie so much as myself, having loste my sonne and my estate in the enterprise, yet it is true that the Spaniards tooke more care to defend the passages leading unto it than they did their towne. . . . But it is true that when Kemys found the rivers low and that he could not approach the banks near the mine by a mile, and when he found a descent, a volley of muskets came from the woods upon the boat, and slew two of the rowers, hurt six others, and shot a valiant gentleman Captain Thornix in the head. He (to wit, Kemys) followed his own advice that it was in vaine to discover the mine (for he gave me this for excuse at his returne that the companies of English in their towne of San Thomé were hardly able to defend it against the dayly and nightly alarmes and assaults of the Spaniards, that the passage to the mine was of thick and unpassable woods, that being discovered they had no men to worke it) did not discover it at all. For it is true that the Spaniards having two gold mines near the towne, left them for want of negroes to work them. . . . Whatsoever that braggadochio the Spanish Ambassador may say I shall prove it . . . and I shall make it appear to any prince or state that will undertake it, how easily those mines and five or six more may be possessed, most of them in places which have never yet been attempted by any enemy, nor any passage to them ever discovered by English, Dutch or French.'

The news which reached the leader, at first by Indian rumour, and on the 14th February by letters, must have seemed to him worse than death itself. The officers wrote that, after receiving the fire from the new town of San Thomé as they passed up the river, they had landed their men on New Year's day, 1618, a league above the settlement; and according to Raleigh himself (although contradicted by the Spaniards and inferentially by Captain Parker), an ambuscade was led against them at nine o'clock in the evening by a Captain Geronimo de Grados. The English rank and file were worthless, and were thrown into confusion, but were eventually rallied, and were led against the town. An untrustworthy story was afterwards told by Raleigh's enemies that young Walter cried out as he advanced, 'Come on, my hearts; here is the mine we must expect. They that look for other mines are fools.' It is, however, an insult to our intelligence to try to persuade us that Raleigh staked his life and fortune, only to take a poor, half-savage town of 130 palm-leaf huts.

In the attack the Governor Palomeque de Acuña

was killed (he is usually called a kinsman of Gondomar by Raleigh's historians, but I can find no evidence that he was so, except his name), and with him fell three or four other Spanish captains. Young Walter died, it is said, crying out to his comrades, 'Go on ! Lord have mercy upon me, and prosper your enterprise.' When the town had fallen, the Spaniards retreated to an island near, from whence they kept up a desultory attack upon the English. Kemys's attempts to find the mine were resisted by them step by step, and once he fell into an ambuscade and lost nine of his men. Lurking in the fastnesses of the woods and creeks with which they were familiar, the Spaniards picked off the Englishmen at their leisure, until 250 of the latter had fallen. The spirits of the men flagged, and disaffection crept through the dwindling ranks of the expedition. Curses and lowering looks followed the unfortunate Kemys in his futile attempts to reach the mine. George Raleigh, hoping against hope, held out as long as he could, and himself explored the near reaches of the river, constantly harassed by the desultory fire of the Spaniards. But a time came at length when it was evident that a further stay would mean extermination piecemeal, for the Indians told them of Spanish reinforcements coming up the river, and there was nothing for it but to re-embark the little force, and on the swift current of the great river sweep down towards the sea, bearing with them the dismal story of failure, which was ruin and death to their leader. With them they took such booty as the poor settlement of San Thomé afforded, and they left buried before the high altar of the plundered church the body of young Walter Raleigh.

The heartbroken leader, on the return of the expedition on the 2nd March, reproached Kemys for the failure. 'For I told him that, seeing my son was lost, I cared not if he had lost a hundred more in opening the mine, so my credit had been saved. I protest before God that if Captain Whitney had not run from me at the Granadas, and carried with him another ship of Captain Wollaston's, I would have left my bodie at San Thomé by my sonne's, or have brought with me out of that, or other mines, so much gold ore as should have satisfied the King that I had propounded no vaine thing. What shall become of me now I know not. I am unpardoned in England, and my poore estate consumed; and whether any other prince or state will give me bread I know not.' Kemys was heartbroken at his chief's reproaches, for he, poor sanguine man, had doubtless done his best, and incontinently retired to his cabin and committed suicide. After his death some of the other officers told Raleigh that, on the way down the river, Kemys had told them that he could have brought them to the mine within two hours' march of the river's side, but as young Walter was killed and Sir Walter still unpardoned, sick, and unlikely to live, he saw no reason why he should open up the mine; either for the Spaniards or the King (of England). The officers answered that though no formal pardon had been given, yet the granting of the patent under the great seal was tantamount thereto. Kemys then pointed out that Raleigh was legally dead, and that the patent therefore had no force. This question of the pardon had been much discussed before Raleigh left England, and Buckingham's kinsmen had offered, for a money payment, to obtain a formal pardon. It is said that Raleigh submitted the question to Bacon, who told him that money was the main desideratum for his expedition, and he need not waste it on the pardon, now he had the patent under the great seal. It is evident by the discussion of the matter by the officers as soon as the failure of the expedition was certain, that they foresaw the probability of what afterwards happened.

Deserted by two of his ships, many of his men mutinous, and his officers falling away from him, as from a doomed man, Raleigh groped up the West India islands, sending from St Kits his cousin, Captain Herbert, with the intelligence of his failure. To his devoted wife he had to send the news, not only of his and her ruin, but of the death of their firstborn, and there are few more pathetic letters than that which he then wrote to his 'dear Besse.' 'I was lothe to write,' he says, 'because I knew not how to comforte you; and God knows I never knewe what sorrow meant till nowe. . . . Comfort your heart, dearest Besse, I shall sorrow for us both. I shall sorrow the lesse, because I have not longe to sorrow, because I have not longe to live.' After sealing the sad letter to his wife, he opened it again to write a long postscript, telling her the story of the expedition and the alleged reasons for Kemys' failure. 'For the rest,' he says, 'there never was a poore man soe exposed to slaughter as I was; for being commanded upon my allegiance to sett downe not onely the country, but the very river, by which I was to enter it, to name my shippes, number of my men and artillery,—this was sent by the Spanish Ambassador to his master the King of Spaine; and the King wrote his letters to all parts of the Indies. . . . If I live, I shall make it known. . . . My braynes are broken, and I cannot write much. . . . Whitney, for whome I sold my plate at Plymouth, and to whome I gave more credit than all my captaines, ran from mee at the Granadas, and Wollaston with him; soe as I am now but five shippes, and one of those I have sent home—my flyboat—with a rabble of idle rascalls in her which I know will not spare to wound mee, but I care not. I am sure there is never a base slave in the fleet hath taken the pains and care that I have done, hath slept so little and hath travailed so much. My friends will not believe them; and for the rest I care not.'

We have seen it asserted by Parker, and it was subsequently reported by others, that Raleigh's intention, when he realised that the Guiana project had failed,

was to lie in wait to capture Spanish vessels and take them to France for sale. It may readily be conceded that he would have had no conscientious scruples in doing so, for the English, when weak, were always attacked by Spaniards ; but there were other considerations now which must have weighed with him. He was ill and heartbroken, his captains had lost faith in him, and, above all, he had realised that his failure had been mainly owing to the fact that the Spaniards were forewarned of all his movements, by the complaisance of the King of England. Under his old mistress he might safely have harassed the Spaniards whenever he met them on the seas, so long as her responsibility was saved. But King James was made of other stuff. Base and truckling by nature, and awestricken at the name of Spaniard, he was willing to descend to any sacrifice of dignity rather than offend Spain ; and Raleigh saw that to plunder on the high seas now would not only have banished his last hope of forgiveness but would have involved his sureties, Lords Arundel and Pembroke, in his ruin. To them he had given his word to return to England and answer for his proceedings, whatever happened. To say that he was uniformly a truthful man, or had a high sense of honour, would be untrue, but Raleigh would never betray a friend who had trusted to his word, and he determined to return to England, going by way of Newfoundland for the purpose of obtaining fresh stores and to careen his ship. Off Newfoundland he had to deal with a formidable mutiny. His soldiers endeavoured to force him to take to piracy, and he refused; but they made him swear that he would not put into an English port without their leave, or at least without obtaining for some of them who were criminals the King's pardon. Under these depressing circumstances Raleigh finally sailed towards his native land. All through the early months of 1618, Gondomar, in England, was doing his best to magnify Raleigh's guilt at Canary. Bailey's lies and unfounded suspicions, however, were not long in meeting with refutation. The English mariner, Captain Reeks, who had been at Lanzarote when Raleigh was there, returned to his native Ratcliff, and told the true story of what had happened. The old Lord Admiral, enemy of Raleigh as he was, did not love deserters, and had Bailey and his ship placed under arrest. On the 11th January the deserter was brought before the full Council, and was made to tell his story in detail, and produce the journal which he had written. When his assertions were sifted it was seen how unfounded they were, and he was severely reprimanded for desertion and slandering his chief. He had whispered that he could, and he would, 'charge Sir Walter Raleigh and other great ones of treason.' This was serious—for Raleigh still had friends in the Council, Carew, Zouch, Arundel and others, though Winwood was dead—and Bailey was challenged for proof. He broke down, and alleged some hearsay gossip, and was imprisoned. Gondomar, however, worried James into releasing his tool, and with a paltry apology, to the disgust of Raleigh's friends, the slanderer was set free.

Although no news came of Raleigh until the arrival of Herbert late in April, with the letters for Winwood and Lady Raleigh, the fate of the leader was already sealed. Gondomar in March had once more exacted from James a positive promise that Raleigh should be delivered to Spaniards if he did the least harm. The news was received with jubilation in Madrid, and the King's secretary thus writes to Gondomar on the subject (19th April 1618): 'Your lordship's account of the conference you had with the King, about Raleigh's affair, pleased our people here so much, that they found it almost too sweet. It really seemed too much that Raleigh should have to be sent hither, but with the choice your lordship has left open to have the punishment inflicted there, they say there never was such an Ambassador before.'

At last, almost simultaneously with the arrival of Raleigh's letters in England, the news reached Madrid from the townspeople of San Thomé. Their story differs somewhat from Raleigh's, but in the main confirms it. They say that the Governor Palomeque learnt of the landing of the English at ten at night, and made ready to attack them; but found them too numerous, and retired to the town, followed by the English. A messenger was sent warning the intruders that the town was a Spanish possession, but nevertheless it was stormed and captured, the public funds, papers, etc., being plundered, and the outskirts of the town burnt. Palomeque was missing, and the townspeople thought he was captured. A Spanish soldier was sent to interview Raleigh (this, of course, was George Raleigh, although the Spaniards thought he was Sir Walter) and to protest against the invasion, and to beg for the return of the Governor, if a prisoner, or news of his fate, if he were dead. 'Be content,' the townspeople besought the English commander, 'with the harm you have already done, and leave us.' The news aroused the greatest indignation in Madrid. Gondomar was about to go home on leave, but was ordered to stay and see the matter through. He was instructed 'to exaggerate as much as you can Raleigh's guilt and try to get the King to make a great demonstration.' If James wanted the friendship of Spain, he must wreak prompt and exemplary vengeance upon those who have done harm to Spanish subjects. 'Do not,' says Philip, 'threaten him; but make him understand that I am offended, and that if a proper remedy be not forthcoming at once, we shall make reprisals and seize English property in Spain.' Before Gondomar received this letter Herbert had brought the news to England. The story is told that the Spanish Ambassador hastened to the palace, and demanded audience of his royal friend. He was told that the King was engaged. He said he wished but to say one word, and was admitted on that condition. He rushed into the royal presence with uplifted hands and assumed horror in his voice, shouting the word pirates ! pirates ! pirates ! and the one word repeated must have been a perfectly intelligible warning to James that he would be called upon to fulfil the promise he had made 'on faith, hand and word.'

Raleigh was storm-driven into Kinsale harbour at the end of May, and there landed the offenders from his ship ; and shortly afterwards brought the ill-fated Destiny alone into Plymouth. During the interval, Gondomar had been busy. Telling his King of the arrival of the man they had already doomed, he says (24th June), 'It would take a long "process" to recount all the efforts I employed with the King and Council to stay Raleigh's voyage before he sailed ; and since I had news of his proceedings in Canary, to have him and his companions proclaimed traitors, and his sureties escheated. I have recently spoken most urgently to the King about it, and have also written him the enclosed letter on the 14th instant, and another on the 20th, when I heard of Raleigh's arrival at Plymouth, urging His Majesty to publish the proclamation which I now enclose.' The proclamation was promulgated on the 11th June, and pronounces Raleigh to be guilty of 'a horrible invasion of the town of San Thomé'; and for 'a malicious breaking of the peace which hath been so happily established, and so long inviolately continued.' There was apparently no need for investigation or defence before condemnation. Raleigh was in the eyes of the world then, as he is to-day, one of the most distinguished of Englishmen, and yet the King of England was willing to forejudge and condemn him unheard, at the bidding of the Ambassador of a power which Queen Elizabeth had defied for forty years, and at a subsequent stage took great credit to himself for doing so. Gondomar continues, 'They have sent to arrest Raleigh and his ships at Plymouth. If he has brought anything of value, it is sure to have been stolen, but I am told he has nothing but some tobacco, and a dish and ewer of silver gilt. It is certain that Raleigh will try to excuse himself, by saying that everything has been done without his orders or knowledge, and thus cast the blame upon the dead, as he and his friends are already doing. But withal, the living bring the plunder, and I think everything possible is being done here in Your Majesty's interest to bring them to signal punishment and restitution. This King gave me his faith, his hand, and his word, that if Raleigh dared so much as to look upon any of Your Majesty's territories or vassals, even if he brought back his ships loaded with gold, he would hand all of them with Raleigh himself to Your Majesty, that you might hang him in the Plaza of Madrid. Now that the time has come for fulfilment, and I have reminded him of it, His Majesty has promised that he will do it as soon as a judicial examination proves the excesses to have been committed; and he says that, for his part, he can do no more than he has done in publishing the proclamation, arresting the offender, and embargoing his property. He says that if Raleigh had attempted to sack Madrid itself he could do no more, and he has sent Buckingham and Digby to me to say the same, and to assure me that Raleigh shall be punished with the utmost severity; these being the words they used, and that Raleigh's friends and all England shall not save him from the gallows.' This, however, was not enough for Gondomar, and he urges Philip almost violently to instruct the Governors of Canary, Azores, etc., as if of their own accord, promptly to seize all English property and persons. 'I also think it will be necessary that Your Majesty's fleet should attack some English ships, on the pretence of their being part of Raleigh's force. The ships and cargoes might be sold promptly, and the money desposited until things are settled.' James, he says, wants peace, and must be frightened. 'The English have changed their tone since I came and have shown them that I will stand no nonsense.'

Whilst this precious letter was being written, Gondomar had one of his friendly confabulations with James, who, for a wonder—perhaps for the purpose of argument only—took Raleigh's part. It was asserted by him, he said, that he had a commission from Queen Elizabeth and Henry IV of France to conquer and colonise the Orinoco; and he had done so in 1595. The fortress and town of San Thomé had been constructed since the annexation of the country by England. As it was necessary for the discovery and working of the mine that this town should be taken, Raleigh's men had taken it. Gondomar hit out at this, and gave the King a piece of his mind. 'I told him that Raleigh's annexation of the country was unfounded. If the contention that the conquest of Your Majesty's territory was necessary for the working of the mine furnished a good reason for Raleigh's proceedings, the conquest of England by Your Majesty would be justified for the taking of Holland, which more really belonged to you than the mine belonged to Raleigh. I asked him what he would think if a Spanish fleet were to commit similar hostilities in the ports of Ireland and Scotland.' James's reply to this shows that he was only 'drawing out' the Ambassador. 'The King replied that I had spoken very well, and had cited an excellent parallel. Raleigh, he said, was a thief, and there was no excuse for him. . . . The King assures me that strict justice shall be done, but I feel sure that he will be slack, unless we keep him up to it by taking the course I recommend. Even though the King hang Raleigh and his companions, and restore the plunder, I should grieve that Your Majesty should be satisfied with this for so atrocious a wickedness. These people should be made to suffer by the seizure of their goods in Spain, which would be a warning both to them and to their neighbours. Perhaps such an opportunity will never occur again of asserting ourselves and giving them a lesson. I told the King and Council that Your Majesty's goodness might lead you to pardon offences against yourself; but conscience will not allow you to forgive injuries done to your subjects. They are already saying on 'Change that English ships and property have been seized in Seville and the islands; and well-disposed people rejoice at it, as do some of the councillors, for the good of the King himself, because, though they know he will not on any account allow war with Your Majesty, they see that he is more confident of peace than is fitting.' The last few lines probably contain the real key to the exaggerated importance attached by the Spaniards to Raleigh's expedition. The sacrifice of Raleigh was to be made a test point, upon which James was to be frightened, and at the same time an object lesson to the world of the meekness with which the King of England was brought to heel by the Spaniard.

CHAPTER XVI

GONDOMAR AND THE KING — RALEGH ARRESTED ON HIS ARRIVAL AT PLYMOUTH—HIS LETTERS TO CAREW

THE methods employed by Gondomar to effect the sacrifice of Raleigh for the exaltation of Spain come out clearly in his letters, most of which now see the light here for the first time. On the 14th June he wrote to James saying that he had always urged upon him the danger of Raleigh being allowed to sail with so many ships, his only object being to rob and lay waste Spanish territory. ‘Your Majesty deigned to reply that, if he committed any offence against the lands or vassals of my master, you would deliver him and his companions to me, to be sent to Spain to be hanged in the Plaza of Madrid. I urged that prevention was much better than cure, whereupon Your Majesty replied that you would insist upon due sureties being given that Raleigh should do no harm. I wrote this to my King, who, in accordance with this assurance, refrained from sending out his fleet to oppose Raleigh, notwithstanding that he was informed by others of the evil intentions of the latter. We know now that Raleigh assailed the Canaries, and attacked towns in Guiana, burning churches, and committing irreparable damage. Captain Bailey left him when he saw what he was about, and came hither to give an account of his proceedings, when he was at once arrested as a traitor, and his goods embargoed, to the great surprise of everyone, especially of myself. Prompt and severe public action should now be taken against Raleigh, in order that my master may see by Your Majesty's acts that you are really desirous of his friendship.'

A week later, when Raleigh had reached Plymouth, another turn or two is given to the screw by Gondomar, and the threats of reprisals become more insolent. On the 20th June the Ambassador wrote to James: 'Raleigh has arrived in Plymouth with all the property he has seized from my master's subjects. I do not call it stolen, or him a pirate, because, as he returns so confidently to an English port, after all I said to Your Majesty to prevent his sailing, it is evident that those who told my King that Raleigh was going as commander of Your Majesty's fleet, for the purpose of way-laying and plundering the Spanish flotilla or of conquering my master's territories, will persist in their opinion. His Catholic Majesty will certainly see that when I persuaded him that Raleigh would do no harm, I was deceived — for the facts are notoriously otherwise. . . . Your Majesty has so good a memory that you will not forget your “faith, hand and word,” pledged to me. You are so great a King, and so good a gentleman, that you will bear me testimony, and admit that all Raleigh’s acts of war and damage were foretold to you in writing and speech a thousand times by me . . . and that I never ceased to urge forcibly that he should not be allowed to sail. Walter Raleigh has robbed, sacked and burnt, and murdered Spanish subjects, and has brought back with him enough wealth to make him and his supporters rich. I have now only to beseech you to take pity on my good intentions, in view of the cries and complaints I shall receive in Spain on account of the damage done by Raleigh, and of the measures of redress which I understand will have been adopted there, as demanded by justice, reason, and my master’s prestige. For justice demands that Raleigh and all his companions should be hanged directly they set one foot on English soil, without waiting for them to set the other foot. I am quite sure the King, my master, would treat any of his vassals so if they had commenced this rupture.’ In written letters such as the above some little diplomatic reserve was necessary; but in Gondomar’s familiar gossips with James, boasting threats were hardly even veiled. In one of the farewell visits to the King, before the Ambassador's projected departure for Madrid, in which there was much embracing and pressing of hands, James was bewailing that the English people were not so generous to him as the Spaniards to Philip III.; and then stopping short, he said, 'Of course I know that, so far as greatness is concerned, the King of Spain is greater than all the rest of us Christian kings put together.' 'This' says Gondomar, 'he repeated six times, praising the grandeur of Your Majesty. When I thanked him, he seized my hand, and held it, pressing it in his, saying that never, in public or in private, would he do, or even think, anything against Your Majesty, but would in all things strive to avoid evil to you. He had, he said, quite banished piracy, and for the last two years no one had dared to bring to England property seized from Spaniards. I should see, he continued, how he would punish Raleigh and his people, and the example would cause his orders in this respect to be better obeyed in future. . . . I replied that no doubt his good intentions had exerted a favourable influence, and I would say as much to Your Majesty; but I wished to point out to him that things were now in a very different condition from what they were in Queen Elizabeth's and Drake's time, for Your Majesty had taken such measures that the most insignificant of your towns was now in a good state of defence . . . and pirates that assailed Your Majesty's possessions now would catch nothing but fish. . . . In talk, the King admitted that if Your Majesty would be his friend, he needed nothing else.'

When Gondomar had thus pledged James up to the hilt to sacrifice Raleigh in any case, and had hectored him into a due condition of humility, he took his leave on 26th June, and made ready to start for Spain. An account of what followed is best told in a selection of his own words, as written to the King of Spain in a letter of the 16th July (N.S.), as at the interviews therein described Raleigh's fate was finally sealed. Cottington, the English Ambassador in Madrid, had been bombarded with demands for vengeance and redress, and with threats of reprisals. He wrote to James in a fright, and Gondomar seconded the effect he produced, by redoubling his own pressure upon the timid King. Cynically he thus informs his King of the fact: 'I have applied the medicines I thought necessary. To persons who do not know the constitution of the patient, they may appear violent. One of them was to spread a rumour that English property had already been embargoed at Seville and the islands. To all inquiries on the subject I reply that, if I were Your Majesty's Governor there, I should do so; and I hoped it was true. . . . I had taken leave of the King, and was about to set out for Spain, when, in accordance with Your Majesty's orders, I deferred my departure and sent to Theobalds to ask for another audience. The King, fearing from Cottington's letter that I wished to see him about Raleigh, and wishing to give time for my anger to cool, sent to say that on Monday 2nd he would expect me at Greenwich. I thought I had better see the Council first, and tackle them ; so I conferred with Buckingham, who ordered them in the King's name to give me audience whenever I wished. I fixed five o'clock on the 29th June ; and on my arrival all the councillors came out to meet me, the Archbishop of Canterbury saying that they had suspended all their business, and willingly attended my orders.' Then Gondomar opened his batteries, and set forth the 'murders, sackings, pillage and burnings' that Raleigh had committed, 'such as never was seen even in time of war.' He said how offended his King was at such insolence. Once more he repeated the story of the sureties, and the King's pledge, on 'faith, hand and word,' to surrender Raleigh and his companions to be hanged in the Plaza of Madrid ; on the faith of which alone the King of Spain had refrained from sending out his fleet to attack the expedition. Great complaints were made that Raleigh in his letter to Winwood had set forth the names of the captains who had attacked San Thom  , as if it had been a meritorious action, and once more the threats of reprisals and boasts of his master's grandeur were reproduced for the benefit of the Council. 'If the punishment were not swift and exemplary, Your Majesty had no need of the King of England's friendship, and in future would take good care of your own prestige and the lives and properties of your subjects. With that I took off my hat, calmly said that I had stated my case, and then re-covered myself.' After a little quiet whispering with the other councillors, Bacon replied. They were all very sorry ; but the King should not be held responsible for the excesses of a private person. The Ambassador might be sure that the King would fulfil his promise, and give full satisfaction. Indeed, he had begun already : for he held Raleigh's sureties, and on mere public rumour he had publicly condemned his proceedings. He had, moreover, arrested Raleigh and his ships as soon as he had arrived. It was impossible to do more. 'Then with a great deal of cordiality he expressed a hope that these little accidents would not shake the two firm columns of our amity, for if this, and other like things, were fittingly punished, there was no reason at all for any interruption in friendship. The Archbishop wished to have his say, to prove his sympathy, but also to bring the question into a controversy between two parties. Doffing his bonnet and bowing his head low, he very artfully said that Raleigh's proceedings certainly deserved exemplary punishment, and he did not know what answer Raleigh could make, thus trying to indicate that it would be necessary to hear him. I stopped him at once, and said that it was no part of my business to act as Raleigh's prosecutor, and this was not a case for tribunals at all—I had no more to say about it. The Treasurer and the Chancellor struck in between us, saying they hoped I would continue my usual good offices. They were all so courteous and flattering, that I was forced to reply in the same spirit. . . . I made the most of San Thomé and Guiana, as many people here think that it is licit to make captures and conquests south of the line, and that San Thomé belonged to England.’ On Sunday the 1st July (O.S.) James arrived at Greenwich, and held a special Council about Raleigh’s affair. There was much difference of opinion, for Raleigh had friends present, especially Carew, but the general agreement was that the most ample satisfaction should be given to Spain, and Raleigh and his companions severely punished; and James made a long speech to the same effect. Raleigh’s friends endeavoured to cause a diversion by complaining of Gondomar’s attitude before the Council. He had, they said, dared to use expressions such as no King or Council of England had ever suffered from a foreign ambassador, and had tried to saddle the King with the responsibility of Raleigh’s acts; saying that he had given his ‘faith, hand and word,’ that if Raleigh did the slightest thing against Spain, he should be delivered over to be hanged in Madrid, as if, forsooth, England were a tributary to the King of Spain. This was rather a facer for James, who said that, though he was a peaceful King, yet he knew how to defend his rights; and Buckingham as behoved him, hotly took up the cudgels. 'Gondomar,' he said, 'was quite right. He had protested from the first, and had been assured that Raleigh should do no harm. No wonder he was indignant ; and was very courteous and kind not to be more violent about it than he was.' Thus encouraged, James said he had no doubt that Gondomar was quite right. Would the Council have him go to war with the King of Spain to defend such atrocious crimes as those of Raleigh ? What would the world say if he did ? Working himself into a passion with his eloquence, the King answered his own question. 'Where he would show his courage,' he said, 'was not in warring against the King of Spain, but against those traitors, who, under cover of gold mines and bringing treasure to England, and other false pretexts, had persuaded him to allow Raleigh to go on his voyage. He (James) was a man of his word, and had given his pledge to the Spanish Ambassador. All he wanted the Council's opinion about was whether Raleigh ought to be punished or not.' Most of the councillors answered in the affirmative, and Raleigh's friends refrained from voting. Since, said the King, they were apparently unanimous, if ever he learnt that in secret, or in conversation, any of them defended Raleigh, he should hold them as traitors. Let this, he added, be a warning to others who wanted to assail the King of Spain, whose friendship was the most desirable thing possible for England.

.

The next afternoon, Monday, 2nd July (O.S.),

Gondomar was rowed down the river to the palace at Greenwich. He tripped laughingly into the King's chamber and said, 'Look how happy I am in England to come back so soon from Spain.' The King hugged him to his breast as usual, and said he wished to God it were so. Then the room was cleared, the doors shut, and the two friends sat side by side. Neither wanted to open the ball, and there was a good deal of friendly sparring. At last James asked what news there was from Spain. This was Gondomar's opportunity, and he launched out in denunciation of Raleigh's crimes, which he said 'were infinitely greater than reported here, and I exaggerated them as much as I could.' James was very humble and apologetic. He had heard so too, and he hoped Gondomar would be satisfied if he saw him doing everything in his power to punish and redress them. Gondomar had been a true prophet, he said, and he (the King) had been grossly deceived. He himself had always doubted about the mine, but he never dreamed that such excesses would be committed. 'But he thought best, even in Your Majesty's interests, that these people should undeceive themselves and suffer the loss, than that he should seem to oppress them. They were undeceived now, and were sending all mines to the devil. As for his pledge to me, he would leave himself in my hands, but he hoped Your Majesty would not ask more in this case, than if Raleigh had sacked a port in England itself; and he could not forget that many persons tried to persuade him that San Thomé belonged to him, and had been annexed by England before the Spaniards came.' Gondomar began to protest violently at this, but the King seized his arm and stopped him by saying that he was only repeating the arguments of Raleigh's friends, and not his own. He was very sorry, and hoped Gondomar would give him credit for good intentions. He had, he said, been examining all that morning and part of the previous day men who had accompanied Raleigh on his voyage. In the main they had confirmed Spanish accounts, except that Captain Kemys was the principal culprit, as he had assured the rest that it was impossible to discover the mine until the Spaniards had been cast out. Seeing that Gondomar was again going to protest, James said that he had replied that Raleigh was in command and must bear the whole responsibility. He (the King) would have justice done, and really hoped that Gondomar would be satisfied. He begged him to send off a courier that very night to Madrid assuring the King of his desire to please him and keep the peace.

When James had run through all the litany of debasement, Gondomar at length got a chance to speak. He said that he must talk plainly. Would the King allow him to speak—as he himself often said—simply as from 'James to James,' forgetting that he was a king, or that the speaker was a poor gentleman?

James was delighted. Of course he would. Gondomar told him, with refreshing frankness, that he, James, could not be judge of Raleigh's case; for the pirate had sailed with his commission, and the same influence which had secured it might be exerted for his defence. No wonder that the King of Spain was being persuaded to take summary vengeance. If he (Gondomar) had been Governor of Seville or Canary, he would not have waited for orders, but would have done it at once. Proclamations were all very well before the amount of the depredations was known; but the time was now passed for papers and words, for Raleigh and his men were in England and still unhung, whilst the councillors who had supported him were not in the Tower.

The King had promised Gondomar that he would not be angry, whatever he might say; but he lost his self-control at this. Snatching off his hat and tearing his hair, he shouted that that sort of justice might do for Spain, but not for England, or wherever he reigned. He never had, and never would, by God's help, condemn anyone without first hearing him in his own defence, and a proper trial, even though he had killed his (James's) son. God knew the first fault of Adam, and yet he did not condemn him unheard.

Yes, replied Gondomar, sarcastically, he saw the laws of Spain and England were quite different; for such men would have been punished in Spain without all this talk and delay. But in future the laws of Spain would be changed in accordance. Look ! he told James, what the King of Spain had done for him ; and now he took the part of a pirate against his friend. Gondomar's love for James had forced this out of him, he said ; for the duty of friendship was to speak the plain truth. But since that was unavailing, the King of Spain would now take the matter in his own hands and defend his honour. This, of course, brought the King to his knees at once. He begged the Ambassador to send his peaceful pledges to Spain that very night, so as to prevent the war party there from having their way. He would arrange the next day for the Council to meet on Wednesday and decide upon Raleigh's condemnation, which, he promised, should be carried out without delay ; and on Thursday he would see Gondomar again and take final leave of him with that assurance. Gondomar, when he wrote this to his King, did not attempt to conceal his exultation at the 'increased prestige' it would give to Spain to make the King of England meekly hand over one of his subjects for punishment in a foreign country. In his delight he left the King's presence in high good humour, and went for a walk in the gardens with the Duke of Lennox. The King sent after him a basket of fine cherries, which he ate as he walked along. Presently great shouts of laughter greeted him from the windows of a summer-house under which he was passing. Looking up he saw the King. 'Oho ! where is the Spanish gravity gone to now ?' shouted the monarch. 'A dignified Ambassador indeed, eating cherries out of a basket !' These were the men, and these were the methods by which Raleigh's life was juggled away, each party trying to outwit the other in the price to be exacted for the sacrifice.

But James did not find it so easy to coerce his Council into doing a great crime to please the Spaniards. Carew, on his knees, prayed for mercy for his kinsman, but James would only promise that Raleigh should not be condemned unheard. In the Council on Wednesday, 4th July (N.S.), there was an almost general opposition to sending him to Spain to be hanged. But James said he had given his promise, and could not break it, and Buckingham confirmed this, casting the blame upon some of his fellow-councillors for assuring the King that Raleigh would do no harm, so that His Majesty had thought he was safe in making the promise. Bacon, though no friend to Raleigh, sought to save the King from the supreme humiliation of handing him over to the Spaniards. The more complete the satisfaction given to Spain the better, he said, but the promise, of which so much was made, was mere talk, and was never intended to be taken literally, or to make England a tributary State. James flew into a passion at this. His promise was not mere talk, he said, and he would fulfil it, without taking any more notice of ignorant and ill-disposed persons ;

and with this he rose in a huff, and flung out of the room.

The next day he saw Gondomar again, and positively promised him to fulfil his pledge. He was more affectionate than before: embraced Gondomar again and again, and swore friendship for ever. The Ambassador said that such kindness demanded some return from him, and that he (the King) should dictate the answer that should be written to the King of Spain's dispatch about Raleigh. James jumped at the idea, and at once dictated 'that he had been grossly deceived, and was so horrified at such crimes as had been committed, that he would punish them swiftly and severely, in a way that should fully satisfy the King of Spain.'

This was not what Gondomar wanted; and he very adroitly said that, as the King had accepted his services as secretary, he ought, as usual, to make him a councillor. 'With all my heart,' said James. 'I then said that the dispatch he had dictated did not satisfy me, and would do no good. He ought, I said, to do as he had promised me, and let me write that, although Raleigh's crimes were worse even than he had expected, he would send him, with all his companions, their ships and booty, prisoners to Spain, in order that Your Majesty might hang the culprits in the Plaza of Madrid. This, I said, would be fulfilling his promise. It was not much to ask him, surely, to send ten or a dozen of the worst of them to be executed in Spain.'

James knew his people would resent this, and tried to temporise ; but Gondomar began to hector again, and the King tremblingly agreed to send Raleigh and the others, in the Destiny, to Spain ; and to recover the rest of the damage from Raleigh's sureties to be paid to the Spaniards. Gondomar told him it was the best thing he could do, if he wanted to avoid war ; and then the King called in Buckingham and Digby, both bribed servants of Spain, to hear him repeat his shameful pledge. In their presence he again assured Gondomar that he would send Raleigh to Spain, no matter what opposition were offered, unless the King of Spain refused to have him, in which case Raleigh and all his companions should be hanged in England. He left the decision with the King of Spain, and begged Gondomar to write immediately to him to that effect. But even this feast of humiliation did not satisfy the Ambassador, and he insolently told the King that he could not write any more verbal pledges to his master ; he must have it in writing. James said that Buckingham should write him a letter embodying the conversation, and then, as if ashamed of the unworthy figure he was cutting, he asked Gondomar if he had ever in his life heard of a king who drafted his dispatches, and adopted resolutions like this, at the bidding of a foreign ambassador. For his part, he had never dreamt of such a thing before, and he did not believe that even the Archduke Albert would be so submissive to the Spanish Ambassador. To this Gondomar replied by asking him, whether he had ever heard of an ambassador consenting to act as secretary to the king to whom he was accredited, and to take his orders as to what he should write to his own king. And so more than half in joke ended the conference, which was enough to make the dead Elizabeth turn in her grave. But the King would not let his friend bid him good-bye until he had button-holed him apart, to tell him 'some familiar domestic things.'

Before Gondomar left London, Buckingham's letter reached him, of which the original was sent to Spain. James had once told Gondomar that 'Buckingham was a greater Spaniard than the Ambassador himself,' and to judge from the wording of this humiliating letter, this can hardly have been an exaggeration. After setting forth the King's sorrow, and the steps already taken against Raleigh, and promising a summary legal process, 'which cannot be altogether avoided,' he says the King will be as severe in punishment as if the attack had been made on an English city, and 'even though Sir Walter Raleigh should have returned with his ships loaded with gold, taken from the King of Spain or his subjects, he would have sent back again both the treasure and the man himself to the King of Spain, to be punished in accordance with the promise given to you (Gondomar), which promise he is still resolved to fulfil punctually against the persons and property of the delinquents, unless he hears that the King of Spain is of opinion that it would be more convenient and exemplary that they should be punished here as severely as their crimes deserved. In this matter His Majesty is fully determined to take the course which may be most honourable to himself, and satisfactory to the King of Spain.' With this humiliating pledge, Gondomar was content, and departed for Spain, certain now that Raleigh was doomed beyond all human aid. But he still urged upon his King the need for the pretended seizure of English ships and property in Spanish ports, in order that, if any delay occurred in the killing of Raleigh, his head might be bought by the release of the embargoed property.

In the meanwhile Raleigh was under arrest at Plymouth. He had, of course, heard on his arrival of the King's proclamation, and knew that he was on his defence. Orders had already been given to Sir Lewis Stukeley, a connection of his own, and Vice-Admiral of Devon, to bring him a prisoner to London, and realise such property as might be on board the Destiny, but Sir Lewis did not start for the west until some time after Raleigh had arrived. In the interim it would have been perfectly easy for the latter to have slipped over to France. He made no attempt to do so, but in company with his devoted wife and his faithful follower, Captain King, remained at Plymouth winding up his affairs. We have seen by his bitter references in his letters to Winwood and Lady Raleigh that he knew that he had been betrayed to failure by the King, and that he was likely to be sacrificed to political exigencies, but he does not seem to have realised fully at first how entirely he was doomed beforehand, and he still had hope. The first thing to be done was to place his own version of affairs before the Council, in order that his friends might act in his favour. On the 21st June he wrote a long important statement to his true friend, Lord Carew; and as Mr Edwards has not printed this letter in his complete collection of Raleigh's known letters, I have no hesitation in reproducing it here, notwithstanding its length. Gondomar sent it to his King in Spanish, and it is now translated back again into English from his version.

‘I am sure your Lordship will have received a copy of my letter sent by Captain North to Secretary Winwood, of whose death I learnt with great sorrow in Ireland. By that letter your Lordship will have learnt the reasons given by Kemys for not discovering the mine, which could have been done, notwithstanding his obstinacy, by means of a cacique of the country, an old acquaintance of mine, if the companies had remained in the river two days longer; inasmuch as the cacique offered pledges to do it. The servant of the Governor, moreover, who is now with me, could have led them to two gold mines, not two leagues distant from the town, as well as to a silver mine, at not more than three harquebuss shots distant, and I will make this truth manifest when my health allows me to go to London. As for the rest, if Whitney and Wollaston had not gone from me at the Granadas, and the rest had not abandoned me in distress at Meny (?) as if they had some great enterprise in hand, I would have returned from Newfoundland to Guiana, and would have died there or fulfilled my undertaking. When I saw that they had deserted me, I resolved to steer for Newfoundland to take in water, and clean the ship, which resolution we had all adopted six days before they left me. But when I was approaching the land I was informed that a hundred of my men had determined to go ashore and join the English settlement, or at all events to do so when the ship was hauled up on the beach for cleaning. Their intention was to board the best ship of the English flotilla at night, and plunder all the friends of England and the Portuguese in these ports, knowing that I should not be able to get the other ship in order under ten or twelve days, and that I had no men to navigate the ship I had left. I thereupon called all the company together and told them that I had no wish to accuse any of them, but as I had been told by some of the masters of the violence they intended to commit, I had decided to return without taking in any fresh provisions, rather than enter in the Newfoundland ports to the great prejudice of my countrymen, and of the fishermen of other nations therein. I then ordered the master to set sail for England ; and the conspirators at once discovered themselves, resisting and shouting that they would rather die than return to England. They were the greater number, and some of the best men I had, some of them being gentlemen. All the harquebusses and swords were in the magazine with the armour for cleaning, and the mutineers had taken possession of them, refusing me admission into the magazine. Finding myself in this peril, I gave way to the mutiny for a time, and during that night I set my course again for Newfoundland, treating in the meanwhile with some of the leaders to abandon the mutiny. With great difficulty I persuaded them to do so, on condition that I would not return to England until I had obtained their pardon for some past piracies ; and they demanded my oath. At last we all agreed to sail for Ireland, and they chose the port of Killibeg in the north, a miserable place frequented by desperate corsairs. If I had not consented to this they would have murdered me and those who stood by me, or else I should have killed most of them, in which case, as the mutineers were the best of my men, I should have been unable to bring the ship into port. It is true that when they had calmed down, they said that if I returned home poor I should be despised, and I answered that even if I were a beggar I would not be a robber, or do anything base, nor would I abuse the confidence and commission of the King. Before doing that, I would choose, not poverty alone, but death itself. I am well aware that, with my ship (than which in the world there is no better) I could have enriched myself by £100,000 in the space of three months, and could have collected a company which would have impeded the traffic of Europe. But those who have told the King that I had feigned the mine, and really intended to turn corsair, are now mistaken in their malice, for after failing in the discovery of the mine, by the fault of another, and after having lost my estate and my son and being without pardon for myself, or security for my life, I have held it all as nought, and offer myself to His Majesty to do with me as he will, without making any terms. As for the mutineers, the greater number of them fled from me in Ireland, and some have been persuaded to surrender themselves to His Majesty's mercy. Since my arrival in Ireland I have been alarmed not a little, and have been told that I have fallen into the grave displeasure of His Majesty for having taken a town in Guiana which was in the possession of Spaniards. When they heard this, my men were so afraid of being hanged, that they were on the point of making me sail away again by force. With regard to taking the town, although I gave no authority for it to be done, it was impossible to avoid, because when the English were landed at night to ensure Kemys's passage, the Spaniards attacked them with the intention of destroying them, killing several, and wounding many. Our companies thereupon pursued them, and found themselves inside the town before they knew it. It was at the entrance of the town that my son was killed, and when the men saw him dead, they became so enraged that, if the King of Spain himself had been there in person, they would have shown him but little respect. With regard to the burning of the houses near the Plaza, they were obliged to do it, because the people had made loop-holes in the walls, and kept up so hot a fire through them, that in a quarter-of-an-hour they would have killed them all.

‘And my Lord : that Guiana be Spanish territory can never be acknowledged, for I myself took possession of it for the Queen of England, by virtue of a cession of all the native chiefs of the country. His Majesty knows this to be true, as is proved by the concession granted by him under the great seal of England to Harcourt. Henry IV., also considering it a country not justly in possession of any Christian prince, gave it to Montbariot ; and his lieutenant held it until, for want of support, he was captured and taken prisoner to Lisbon. Your Lordship has a copy of the patent that Count Maurice and the States gave to some Flemings, who held part of the country for ten years, until by reason of negligence they were surprised and defeated by the Spaniards. They are now again beginning to settle there. It will thus be seen that His Majesty, in any case, has a better right and title than anyone. I heard in Ireland that my enemies have declared that my intention was to turn corsair and fly ; but, at the manifest peril of my life, I have brought myself and my ship to England. I have suffered as many miseries as it was possible for me to suffer, which I could not have endured if God had not given me strength. If His Majesty wishes that I should suffer even more, let God's will be done ; for even death itself shall not make me turn thief or vagabond, nor will I ever betray the noble courtesy of the several gentleman who gave sureties for me.—Your poor kinsman, W. RALEGH.

‘Postscript.—I beg you will excuse me to my lords for not writing to them, because want of sleep for fear of being surprised in my cabin at night has almost deprived me of my sight, and some return of the pleurisy which I had in the Tower has so weakened my hand that I cannot hold the pen. 1st (21st) June 1618.’

This important letter, which, so far as I have been able to ascertain, is now printed for the first time, must have been written on the day of Raleigh's arrival at Plymouth, and before his wife left London. It contains the chief points upon which he afterwards depended for his formal defence, and clears up much of the obscurity which has hitherto surrounded his actions. It is evident that he had no idea of the serious light in which it suited the King to regard his proceedings ; but the remark about his sureties indicates that, even if he had known, he would have returned to face the consequences rather than have left them in the lurch. Before the above letter was dispatched, apparently, he received a copy of the allegations made against him by some of his deserting officers, and wrote a second letter to Carew without date, but evidently enclosed with the first. As this letter also is not included by Mr Edwards in Raleigh's complete letters, it is reproduced here in full, translated from the Spanish version sent to the King of Spain by Gondomar.

‘Since my arrival here I have had handed to me a copy of the statement given to your Lordship against me. They must say something for themselves. The truth is they all wanted to turn thieves but Warham St Leger, if they had had a chance, but they were obliged to come back. I myself was in manifest peril because I wished to return.

‘They say I lingered at Plymouth (i.e., on the outward voyage), but they know I should not have stayed there a day but for Pennington, St Leger, Bailey, Whitney, and Wollaston. I entered Falmouth by reason of head winds, and put into Ireland in consequence of a heavy gale, in which Chidley's pinnace and all her men were lost, and one of my boats driven into Brest. Of the provisions I took in Ireland they all had their share, although they had credit there for their requirements. The only things I got in the Canaries was a basket of oranges and three loaves of sugar, sent to me by the Countess of Gomera. Chidley was in no want of provisions, for he brought a supply for eight months from his home in England, and the rest of them had great quantities from Ireland, where I used my influence with Lord President not to send them prisoners to England, as he otherwise would have done, and I did not know what vile accusations they had made against me. With regard to the sacking of San Thomé, I have told you the truth in the other letters. I have only to add these men have not said a single true word.

‘As to their last accusation, that I was going to abandon my country and bring them into trouble, certainly if I had had such an idea I could have carried it out with their full consent, but I risked my life to oppose it, and the fact of my having come hither freely and unconditionally, and cast myself upon His Majesty’s mercy is a sufficient proof of my intention. If I left here to live elsewhere because I had not a pardon, why did I come back? I only give your Lordship a brief answer to the accusations. I hope to live to answer them to their faces, and prove them all to be cowards and liars, and, in spirit, thieves. I write this after having sealed the other letters, and I pray you give a copy of them to my poor wife, who, with the death of her son and these rumours, I fear will go mad. I forgot to answer the third article, in which they accuse me of having sacked the town before seeking the mine. I have already said that the men entered the town at night before they were aware of it, and that they burnt the part near the Plaza to save their lives, as probably they would not have willingly done otherwise, because in those houses everything of value was burnt. But with regard to their most impudent assertion, that the entering of the town and burning the houses was contrary to all my promises and protestations, I shall be content to suffer death if I had any part or knowledge whatever of the burning or sacking. I knew nothing about it. It took place for the reasons already stated, and I could not, moreover, protest against a thing of which I had not even thought.

‘At the end of the article they say that it was done without their consent; and it is true that it was never proposed. But their desire to appear ignorant of the enterprise is imprudent, because I never did anything without consultation. Besides Pennington had a company there (i.e., at San Thomé) under his lieutenant, and Chidley also obtained a company which he said he would command himself, but apparently he did not dare to do so. St Leger also had his company there; so that it is evident that they participated in the enterprise, and could not be ignorant of it.’

These two letters are of the highest possible importance as evidence in Raleigh's favour. It is undoubted that he had provided against the possibility of attack from the Spaniards in his attempt to reach the mine, and before his departure he made no secret to anyone of his intention to use force, if force were used against him. The real points of the accusations against him, when he returned, were, first that he intended to turn pirate, and next that he had attacked a territory already possessed by the Spaniards. That they had a settlement at the mouth of the Upata, below the Caroni, seen by Kemys in 1596, he was of course aware; and also that it had been shifted to some other place since, but he had no exact knowledge of its new position, and, from the letters given above, evidently did not anticipate that it would be necessary to attack it before he reached the mine. The establishment, moreover, of one isolated settlement could not be held to give the Spaniards dominion over the whole of the Orinoco, and presumably if Raleigh's expedition had landed at any other place than in the neighbourhood of San Thomé, even King James must have held him guiltless. It is conceivable that, if Raleigh had been with the river expedition, he would have gone elsewhere to explore on finding that the new town of San Thomé blocked the mine, and would not have landed. But in any case, when once the English were first attacked, as from the convincing statements in the above letters they evidently were, it was impossible to avoid a conflict, and it seems unjust and inconsistent to have punished the absent leader for it. According to James's view, his crime was for landing in the place at all, when they found the Spaniards in possession; but as this latter fact was unknown to Raleigh, and he was hundreds of miles away, his personal offence in the matter was certainly not heinous. With regard to his piratical intentions on the silver fleet, however much or little foundation there may have been for the accusations against him in that respect, and they are not unlikely to be true, for 'no peace beyond the Line' was an axiom generally accepted by men of his school, the fact that he attempted nothing of the sort, and exposed his life at the hands of the mutineers in consequence, finally returning to England, as he had promised, should surely have absolved him from blame. But the point of his guilt or innocence was now of secondary consideration. We have seen by the letters of Gondomar that he was condemned before he reached Guiana at all—indeed, before he left England; for the extortion of the promise from the foolish King, upon his 'faith, hand and word,' to send Raleigh to Spain to be hanged if he 'even so much as looked upon the territories or subjects of Your Majesty' was practically a death warrant. James gave to the Ambassador full particulars and charts of Raleigh's projected voyage; and it was intended by Gondomar from the first that he should be drawn into a conflict, which would afford a pretext for the Spaniards to claim the fulfilment of the King's promise. Whatever he did, or failed to do, Raleigh was doomed from the moment that Gondomar found himself unable to stop the expedition, and cajoled the King into giving his fatal pledge upon conditions for the fulfilment of which the Spaniards could so easily invent a pretext.

CHAPTER XVII

RALEGH'S JOURNEY TO LONDON—STUKELEY—ATTEMPT TO ESCAPE—PRETENDED MADNESS AT SALISBURY—ANOTHER ATTEMPT TO ESCAPE—BETRAYED BY STUKELEY—PROCEEDINGS AGAINST RALEGH—ATTEMPTS TO ENTRAP HIM—MOCK TRIAL AT WESTMINSTER BEFORE THE COUNCIL—CONDEMNED TO DEATH—LAST INTERVIEW WITH HIS WIFE—ON THE SCAFFOLD IN OLD PALACE YARD

RALEGH with his wife and Captain King started for London in the middle of July. They had not gone twenty miles on their way before they met Sir Lewis Stukeley coming to arrest Sir Walter, and they had to retrace their steps. Stukeley at once set about realising the contents of the Destiny. He was a kinsman of Raleigh and affected friendship with him, but events proved him to have been as black-hearted a traitor as ever lived. Whilst he was busy with the ship, Raleigh was simply placed under nominal arrest in the house of a private gentleman. It was three weeks since the Destiny had arrived, and during that time, as we have seen, the leader had learned to the full the accusations against him. He had, however, made no attempt to escape from the country; although in King James's 'declaration' or apology for his judicial murder, written by Bacon, the contrary is falsely asserted. But now Lady Raleigh's entreaties prevailed upon her husband to seek to avoid the plots which she knew were laid for his destruction. By the aid of King a boat was hired to carry him to France, and it lay out of gunshot in the harbour. At night Raleigh entered a boat to board her, and had gone a quarter of a mile—had practically, indeed, placed himself beyond danger—when the thoughts of his pledge to his sureties, Arundel and Pembroke, rushed through his mind, and he insisted upon returning. Lady Raleigh was in despair, but she could not move him. He would face his accusers and justify himself.

Stukeley and his charge, with Lady Raleigh, Captain King, and a French doctor named Manourie, whom Stukeley had engaged to spy upon Raleigh, started for London on the 25th July. Manourie talked chemistry with his patient, and wormed himself into his confidence. On reaching Salisbury, Raleigh hinted to him that he had reasons for wishing to delay on the journey, in order that his friends in London might have longer time to work on his behalf, and asked him to administer an emetic, or give him other means to feign sickness. Manourie consented to do so, and it was agreed that Lady Raleigh and King should go forward to London, whilst their chief found means to stay at Salisbury. King had never ceased to bewail the lost opportunity of escape, and had broached to Manourie a plan for another attempt, in which the doctor pretended to associate himself, and Raleigh himself consented. A ship was to be placed in the Thames in waiting for an opportunity for flight to France. Suddenly, after Lady Raleigh and King had gone, Stukeley was horrified to find that his charge had apparently lost his reason, and was gnawing the rushes on the floor and behaving like a wild animal. An ointment provided by Manourie, moreover, had covered him with a fearful purple eruption which was thought to be the plague, and the emetic had rendered him deathlike in appearance. The device was an undignified one, and did nothing to improve his case when the trick was divulged ; but it gave Raleigh during his few days' delay time to write his Apologie for the Voyage to Guiana, upon which his formal defence rests, and which will always remain the best record of the events of the expedition, taken in conjunction with the diary of the first portion of the voyage up to the 13th February. James was on a progress through the southern counties at the time, and arrived at Salisbury whilst Raleigh was there, as the prisoner doubtless had foreseen and intended. The King was scandalised at the delay, and peremptorily ordered Stukeley to conduct his charge to London. This was on the 1st August, and if Manourie is to be believed—which is extremely doubtful—through all the rest of the journey to London, Raleigh was speaking disrespectfully of the King, and talking of the plans of escape. The Frenchman says that he offered him £50 a year for life for his aid. At Staines, he asserts that Raleigh gave him a splendid jewel worth £150, with which to purchase Stukeley's connivance, which in appearance, at least, was easily obtained. At Brentford, Raleigh was met by a French gentleman named David de Novion, Sieur de la Chesne, the translator at the French embassy, who managed to tell him that the French agent had something of great interest to communicate to him. On reaching Lady Raleigh's house in Broad Street, whither he was taken before going to the Tower, Le Clerc, the French agent, and La Chesne saw him and said they had made arrangements for his escape, and had a ship waiting to carry him to Calais. But King had made arrangements too, and his ketch was lying in the river. Raleigh preferred to escape by means of King, and all arrangements were made. Stukeley pretended to enter fully into the plans, but gave reports constantly to Secretary Naunton, who had succeeded Winwood. Raleigh was, indeed, doubly betrayed, for King's boatswain, Hart, had turned traitor, and it was he who awaited the party at the stairs to row them down the river to the ketch off

Tilbury. Raleigh, with Stukeley and his son and a page, on the night of Sunday, 9th August, crept out of the house in Broad Street and walked to the Tower Dock, where they found King and his men waiting with two wherries. Before stepping into the boat Stukeley saluted King and asked him whether he had not shown himself an honest man; to which the captain drily replied that he hoped he would continue so. Before they had gone twenty strokes, the rowers said that they were being followed by Mr Herbert's boat. Raleigh was disturbed, but Stukeley sought to tranquillise him. Then the prisoner did an unfortunate thing. He asked the oarsmen—who, of course, did not know him, for he wore a false beard—whether they would continue to row on, even if an attempt was made to arrest him in the King's name. This thoroughly alarmed the men, who began to cry, and almost stopped rowing altogether. Raleigh said he had had a squabble with the Spanish Ambassador, and offered the men ten pieces of gold to go on, and Stukeley, pretending to be annoyed at his fears, threatened to kill the oarsmen if they tarried. But Raleigh was still full of fears, and could not be convinced by all the protestations and embraces of Stukeley, and on approaching Plumstead peremptorily ordered the boatmen to turn back. Herbert's boat then approached them, and Raleigh saw he was betrayed, but still apparently had no suspicion of Stukeley, whom he begged still to retain him in his custody, and gave him some further present; whilst the traitor hugged him, and pretended to invent plans for his safety. He persuaded his prisoner to land at Greenwich, and the pursuing boat followed them. When they were landed the scoundrel threw off the mask, and handed his prisoner to men from the other boat, wearing the livery of Sir William St John, that kinsman of Buckingham who had received the bribe to get him out of the Tower. 'Sir Lewis,' said Raleigh, when he saw he was betrayed, 'these actions will not turn out to your credit.' Nor did they, for the execrations of all England followed Sir Judas Stukeley, as he was thenceforward called, and he died miserably, ruined and mad, after fruitlessly seeking like the King to free himself from the odium of Raleigh's death.

On the morning of Monday, 10th August, the prisoner once more entered the fortress that had held him so long. The next day, Tuesday, there was held a solemn meeting of the Council of State in far off Madrid, to decide upon his fate; and it was resolved that it would be more convenient that he should be executed in London rather than in Spain. And so the great Englishman was condemned by a foreign tribunal before even the form of a trial had been gone through in London. Since he had been condemned to death, it was now necessary to search for some plausible legal pretext for killing him. The Privy Council tried very hard, by frequent interrogatories, to entangle Raleigh himself into compromising admissions. With regard to his proceedings on the voyage he was immovable, and on perfectly firm ground. First, he said, San Thomé did not belong to Spain, for he had annexed the whole region himself in 1595, and had continued his communications with it ever since: the King had acknowledged this by granting Harcourt's patent, and his own; 2nd, what had been done was in self-defence; and 3rd, the Spaniards had simply gone there when they were informed of his project. He contended, moreover, that the common law of England had no jurisdiction for acts committed out of the realm of England; and the Admiralty Court must decide in his favour, as what was done was on territory belonging to King James.

There seemed certainly no sufficient ground for passing the death sentence for what he had done on the voyage; but if only he could be convicted of treasonable practices with the French, a decent reason for his condemnation could be found. It was not convenient to probe too deeply his former communications with the French Ambassador, but La Chesne was a comparatively humble individual, and his offer to aid an escape was seized upon with avidity. He was arrested, carried before the Council, and closely interrogated. At the first few examinations he denied everything, as did the French agent. The latter was told that he had abetted the escape of a man he knew was under sentence of death, and would not any longer be considered as a diplomatist, his denials being treated as proofs of the many vague charges of intrigue which were brought against Raleigh. Father Fuentes, a Spanish agent, was told by the King on the 12th October, that he was daily discovering the most extraordinary things about Raleigh. He (Raleigh) had intended, he said, by means of the French, to oust the Spaniards from America, but that he (James) would prove his friendship for Spain by punishing Raleigh. Shortly afterwards Ulloa, the Spanish Chargé d'Affaires, went to Royston to convey to the King of England Philip's orders that Raleigh was to be executed in England, and James then said that these disclosures about Raleigh had made him lose his friendship for France. The French had tried to attract Raleigh to their country, and Des Marets had been at the bottom of the whole expedition. But Raleigh should be executed and full reparation made for the damage done to Spain. He had only brought back with him two little bits of gold, but they should be given up, as they subsequently were, to Ulloa. To this Ulloa replied, that he (James) was delaying Raleigh's execution longer than was needful: he hoped the matter would be promptly settled, and in the next letter he wrote to Philip (28th October) he enclosed what purported to be a commission given by Admiral Montmorenci to Raleigh before he sailed. Some sort of confession was squeezed out of La Chesne, though what it was is not clear, for all the papers in the case have disappeared; but whatever it was, public opinion was encouraged to believe that it disclosed a deep plot, by which Guiana was to be handed over to the King of France; and the Spanish agent's letters are full of horrified references to the iniquity of it. All through the autumn Raleigh was struggling in the toils, and the Spanish agent reports that in October even bets were being laid at Court that he would escape with his life. The Queen constantly pleaded for him, but her pleading was of little use, for she, too, was fading into her grave, and had lost all influence over the King; and the Committee of the Council, whose duty it was to find some pretext by which Raleigh might 'handsomely' be hanged, could only report to the King that they had not found it easy. Raleigh had foiled them at every turn; and as a last resource, they appointed as a special keeper and spy upon him a certain Sir Thomas Wilson, who for many years had been engaged in services of a like nature, and at once managed to worm himself to some extent into Raleigh's confidence. He promised him the King's forgiveness if he would tell all he knew, he intercepted his letters to his wife, he sought to lure him into compromising admissions about France, and his alleged piratical intentions; but withal little or nothing could be obtained of an incriminatory character. 'I never sought for any French commission nor never had any,' said Sir

Walter, and to this assertion he adhered. Sick and weak, and in utter despondency, he wrote in October to Buckingham one of those servile letters which came from him in moments of profound distress, in which he seeks to excuse his late attempt to escape, by the evidently false suggestion that it was prompted only by a desire to prove to the King that he had been sincere in the Guiana voyage, by returning thither at once with one ship, 'being resolved (as it is well known) to have done it from Plymouth, had I not been restrained. Hereby I hoped, not only to recover His Majesty's gracious opinion, but to have destroyed all those malignant reports which have been spread of me.' The suggestion that he intended to start from France, even with one ship, to go to Guiana, was an unfortunate one, and certainly could not be expected to do him much good with the King. To Carew, also, he wrote from the Tower, again vigorously setting forth his view of the case in similar terms to those in which he wrote from Plymouth. A famous letter to the King, which both Mr Edwards and Mr Stebbing believe to have been written from the Tower on the 24th September, in which he says, 'If it were lawful for the Spaniards to murder 26 Englishmen tyenge them back to back, and then cutt theire throates . . . and it may not be lawfull for Your Majesty's subjects, being forced by them, to repel force by force, we may justly say, O ! miserable English,' must have been written from Plymouth soon after his arrival, as a copy of it—or, as I believe, the original—was sent to the King of Spain on the 16th July. By September he was, as he knew, marked for death in the Tower, he had no spirit for writing such a letter to the King as this. His tone had entirely changed.

At length James began to lose patience. The Spanish agent and Father Fuentes were pestering him constantly about the delay in killing Raleigh, the negotiations about the marriage with the Infanta were at a critical stage, and it became necessary, if they were not to cool, that James should somehow fulfil his promise. Every subterfuge to prove something treasonable against the prisoner had failed, and Bacon and the lawyers of the Crown were instructed to devise some legal fiction by which Raleigh might be sacrificed. His old opponent Coke drew up the opinion at which they arrived. Raleigh, in effect, it said, being now under sentence for high treason, could not be tried for any other crime committed since, because he was dead in law; and the Committee of Council recommended that the King should issue a warrant for the death sentence of 1603 to be carried out, whilst at the same time publishing for the information of the people an account of his 'late crimes and offences.' By this means it would be made to appear that only respect for the law prevented him from being ostensibly punished for his new 'crimes,' though really he would be so. An alternative plan was suggested, by which he might be judged by a secret sitting of the whole Council and the judges, in the presence only of certain invited noblemen and gentlemen, and charged with his recent offences, whereupon the Council might recommend the King to issue a warrant for his execution on the attainder of 1603, 'in respect of his subsequent offences.' How deep was James's distrust and hatred of Raleigh is seen in his reply to this recommendation. He adopted the second procedure, but with the omission of the judges and the few invited spectators. No sort of publicity, however modified, was to be allowed, because it would make the prisoner too popular, as was found by experiment at the arraignment at Winchester, where by his wit he turned the hatred of men into compassion.

It was therefore decided that the Council should sit secretly as a quasi-criminal court, and advise the King as to whether the new offences committed by Raleigh would justify the execution of the death sentence passed in 1603. That the proceedings of this mock trial were a mere matter of form is proved by the fact that on the 23rd October, the day before the final meeting of the Council, a consultation of the law officers was held as to the way in which the sentence was to be carried out. It was decided that the mere issue of a warrant for execution was not now sufficient, as so many years had elapsed since the trial ; but that the prisoner should be brought up under Habeas Corpus before the King's Bench, and asked if he had any reasons to allege why sentence should not be passed, as he might plead that a pardon had been granted, or that he was not the person who had been sentenced. This course was decided upon, and the warrant sealed with the Great Seal before the proceedings before the Council on the 24th October. Mr Stebbing, Raleigh's latest biographer, quotes, as representing what took place on this occasion, the notes from the Lansdowne MSS. (142 fol. 396) in which the Attorney-General, Sir H. Yelverton formulated the whole of the charges, and Raleigh replied to them. I am of opinion, however, that he is mistaken in this, and that the notes refer to an early stage of the proceedings, namely, the 17th August. The records of the sitting of the 24th October have really been lost, but it is evident that the prisoner was subjected to another long interrogatory, and that finally Bacon informed him that the Council would advise the King to order the sentence of 1603 to be executed. Private as the proceedings were, however, the Spanish agent, Ulloa, knew all about them, for he wrote to King Philip on the 16th November (6th November English style) saying: 'On Saturday last, the 3rd instant (24th October), Walter Raleigh was taken from the Tower to the Council, where they kept him under examination from 3 o'clock in the afternoon until 7 at night. I understand that the High Chancellor of England (Bacon) described to him the injuries he had inflicted upon Your Majesty's subjects and territories ; and how greatly he had abused the King's permission to discover the gold mine, of which he had pledged his word he knew the situation. When he had finished the recital, he told Raleigh that he must die. On hearing this Raleigh lost consciousness for a time, and on coming to himself I am told he spoke most wildly. He was taken back to the Tower and put into another room. They changed his clothes and his servant, and appointed guards to watch him, who were relieved every hour, never leaving him alone day or night in order that everything he said might be known. This care was also necessary so that he might not put an end to his life by poison, the knife, or otherwise. On Wednesday the 7th he was removed from the Tower well guarded to the King's Bench, where he found Sir Henry Montague, Chief Justice of England, and the Sheriffs. The Chief Justice notified to Raleigh the sentence of death, and delivered him to the Sheriff, who was authorised to execute the King's warrant. Raleigh wished to speak but was not allowed to do so, and was conveyed to the Gatehouse prison.'

This relates pretty accurately what really took place. Raleigh was aroused from his bed in the Tower in the early morning of the 28th October to be taken to the King's Bench. He was in a burning fever, and dressed hastily without arranging his curly white hair. As he passed through the corridors, an old servitor pressed forward and reminded him of this :

‘Let them kem it that have it,’ he replied, and then as if to bring a smile to the man’s woeful face he added, ‘Peter, dost thou know of any plaister to set a man’s head on again when it is off?’

On his arrival at the King’s Bench, Yelverton, the Attorney-General, demanded that sentence should be passed upon him for the conviction of 1603. The Clerk of the Crown read the records of the previous trial, and the prisoner was then asked by Montague if he had anything to urge why sentence should not be passed. Raleigh began to defend himself about Guiana, but was told that was not to the purpose. ‘All I can say then,’ he replied, ‘is that the judgment I received to die so long since cannot now, I hope, be strained, for since then it was His Majesty’s pleasure to grant me a commission to proceed on a voyage beyond the seas, wherein I had martial power on the life and death of others, so, under favour, I presume I stand discharged of that judgment. . . . By that commission I gained new life and vigour ; for he that hath power over the lives of others must surely be master of his own.’ ‘The commission does not infer pardon,’ said Montague, ‘because treason is a crime which must be pardoned by express words, not by implication.’ ‘It that be your Lordship’s opinion,’ replied the prisoner, ‘I can only put myself upon the mercy of the King. His Majesty, as well as others who are here present, have been of opinion that in my former trial I received but hard measure. Had the King not been exasperated anew against me, certain I am that I might have lived a thousand years before he would have taken advantage of that conviction.' Then he pleaded that he might be granted some little time to arrange his affairs, and asked for pens, ink and paper ; for he had something, he said, of which to relieve his conscience, and to satisfy the King. The plea that his commission condoned his past treason was his last hope, and that was now gone. So, calm and smiling, the great Englishman was led from the Hall to the little prison of the Gatehouse hard by ; doomed beyond hope now to be sacrificed for daring to assert the right of England to conquer and civilise a share of the vast continent of South America, a martyr to the cause of a great colonial Britain ; done to death by the basest King that ever sat on Britain's throne. Not an hour was to be lost before the shameful deed was consummated. The King had hidden himself in the country to be out of the way of appeals for mercy, or the execrations of the indignant populace, and before the day waned the scaffold was being erected in Old Palace Yard, where the last scene of the tragedy was to be enacted. The black deed was to be got through early ; if possible, before the people were fully astir, for it was Lord Mayor's day, and all the citizens would flock to see the brave show which came from the city. From the moment that all hope on earth had fled for him, there was no more weak whining, no more abject servility for Raleigh. Dignified and cheerful, as in his best moments, without bravado and without complaint, his last hours vindicated his character for true courage and nobleness. On his way from the Hall to the Gatehouse he met an old acquaintance, Sir Hugh Beeston, whom he asked whether he would come to the execution the next morning. 'I do not know what you may do for a place,' he added; 'for my own part, I am sure of one. You must make what shift you can.' His kinsman, Thomas Thynne, came to see him at the Gatehouse, and seemed to think that he was more cheerful than was becoming. 'Do not carry it with too much bravery,' he said; 'your enemies will take exception if you do.' 'It is my last mirth in this world,' he replied; 'do not grudge it me. When I come to the sad parting you will see me grave enough.' The Dean of Westminster, who attended him, was struck with the same idea, and warned him against vainglory. 'He seemed to make so light of it that I wondered at him. But he gave God thanks that he never feared death. . . . He was the most fearless of death that ever was known, and the most resolute and confident, yet with reverence and conscience.'

After nightfall the devoted wife was brought to the Gatehouse to take a last leave of her husband. She, poor soul, had prayed and hoped up to now that he might be saved. Her boy, Carew Raleigh, had addressed a passionate appeal to the King for his father's life, and Lady Raleigh had continued to pray to her husband's friends and kinsmen on the Council to intercede for him. But it was all of no avail ; and the only grace she could get was that his dead body should be delivered to her. In their last hours on earth together he told her he could not trust himself to speak of their dear little son ; it would make the parting only the more bitter for them both ; and as if to divert her own thoughts from her approaching widowhood, he dwelt mainly upon her future vindication of his good name, in case, as he feared, that he might be prevented from himself doing so on the scaffold. Whilst they were thus communing, the clock of the Abbey boomed out the hour of midnight, and the agonised wife was obliged to tear herself away. 'It is well, dear Bess,' were his last words to her, 'that thou mayest dispose of that dead which thou hadst not always the disposing of when alive.'

Through most of the night the prisoner mused and wrote. He drew up notes for his intended speech upon the scaffold ; and at some time during his last hours must have written the verse which was found in his Bible after his death.

*'Even such is time ! who takes in trust
Our youth, our joys, and all we have,
And pays us but with earth and dust :
Who, in the dark and silent grave,
When we have wandered all our ways,
Shuts up the story of our days.
But from that earth, that grave and dust,
The Lord shall raise me up, I trust.'*

The Dean of Westminster was with him to the last, but from his account of his conversations with the prisoner he would seem to have been more controversial than consolatory. 'After he had received the Communion in the morning,' writes the Dean, 'he was very cheerful and merry, and hoped to persuade the world that he dyed an innocent man, as he sayd. Thereat I told him that in these dayes men did not dye in that sort, innocent, and his pleading of innocency was an oblique taxing of the justice of the realm. He confessed justice had been done, and by course of law he must dye, but yet I should give him leave, he sayd, to stand upon his innocency in the fact. . . . I then putt him in mind of the death of my Lord of Essex: how it was generally reported that he was a great instrument of his death, which, if his heart did charge him with, he should repent and ask God forgiveness. To which he made answer as in the former relation; and sayd, moreover, that my Lord of Essex was fetched off by a trick, which he privately told me of. . . . He was very cheerful that morning he dyed; eate his breakfast hertily, and tooke tobacco; and made no more of his death than it had been to take a journey; and left a great impression in the minds of those that beheld him; inasmuch that Sir Lewis Stukeley and the Frenchman grow very odious. This,' adds the Dean, 'was the news a week since; but now it is blowen over, and he is allmost forgotten.'

As he was about to leave the Gatehouse on his long journey a cup of wine was handed to him, and he was asked whether it was to his liking. 'I will answer you,' he replied, 'as did the fellow who drank of St Giles's bowl as he went to Tyburn, "It is good drink, if a man might but tarry by it."'

On the morning of the 29th October 1618 Sir Walter Raleigh was led forth for the short walk from the Gatehouse to the scaffold in Old Palace Yard. He wore a black velvet wrought gown over a brown satin doubtlet, with a ruff band and black taffety slashed breeches, with ash-coloured silk stockings. It was still early—between seven and eight o'clock—but the news had spread that the famous man was to lose his life, and crowds of people had flocked to Westminster to see the sight. The story is thus told by the Spanish agent, Ulloa, to King Philip, at whose behest the head of Raleigh was to fall. 'They brought him on foot, surrounded by 60 guards, to the square at Westminster, near the palace, where the scaffold had been erected. When he ascended it he spoke, as I have been told, for three-quarters-of-an-hour, saying that he went to discover that gold mine, hoping to enrich England, and that he had sailed with that intention, but that Captain Kemys, who guided him, had deceived him; for at his despair at having mistaken the place he had killed himself. Raleigh said not a word about the atrocities he had committed at San Thomé or elsewhere in the Indies, and denied everything he had confessed to the King and Council of his treaties with France, declaring that the French agent had spoken to him but once out of courtesy. He excused Lord Carew and Lord Hay, Earl of Doncaster, who were those that aided him in his expedition to Guiana. He also entreated everyone to believe that he had not been instrumental in causing the death of the Earl of Essex, nor had he rejoiced thereat, as had been imputed to him. On the contrary, he had regretted it more than his own sins. He declared that he was not an Atheist, as some thought, but a Protestant and a loyal subject of the King. When he ended his discourse, the executioner with his axe (which Raleigh felt to see whether it was sharp) cut off his head with two strokes, and held it up to the multitude. As this happened on Lord Mayor's day, an immense number of people were present, and the punishment was consequently the more public. Although he was sentenced to be hanged, his friends, who, as I have said, are many and powerful, did their utmost with the King to obtain his pardon and save his life (in cipher, and the Queen has helped as much as she could to this end), but the only favour they could obtain was that he should be beheaded instead of hanged.

‘On the scaffold, near Raleigh, until he was beheaded, were the Earl of Arundel, the Earl of Oxford, Lord Chamberlain, and the Earls of Doncaster and Northampton, and several members of the Council were present at a window, concealed behind the shutters. Raleigh's spirit never faltered, nor did his countenance change. On the contrary, he was extremely brave through it all. (In cipher. The death of this man has produced a great commotion and fear here, and it is looked upon as a matter of the highest importance, owing to his being a person of great parts and experience, subtle, crafty, ingenious, and brave enough for anything. His supporters had declared that he could never be executed. . . . A declaration is being drawn up of Raleigh's death, which the King tells me will soon be made public.' . . .)

This is the testimony of Raleigh's enemies. His friends are even more emphatic as to his noble bearing upon the scaffold. He had always feared that he would be secretly put out of the way to prevent his last public vindication from his own mouth, and his first exclamation of rejoicing on the scaffold was that he was brought out in the light to die. He was weak with fever, and could hardly be heard by the members of the Council who sat at a window near, so his friends Arundel, Doncaster and others came down to the scaffold and stood by him whilst he spoke. Most solemnly, and with convincing eloquence, he told his story once again. He called God to witness, with his dying breath, that he was a loyal Englishman, and had had no treaties with the French, that he had had no hand in the death of Essex, and that his action in the Guiana expedition had been throughout honest and sincere. He indignantly refuted the lies of Manourie and Stukeley as to his alleged disloyal expressions and intentions, and then calmly and cheerfully prepared for the end. 'I have a long journey to go,' he said, as he put off his long velvet gown and satin doublet, and then he asked the headsman to let him see the axe. 'Dost thou think I am afraid of it.' Then, smiling as he handed it back, he said to the Sheriff, 'This is a sharp medicine, but it is a sound cure for all diseases.' When he was asked which way he would lie upon the block, he replied, 'So the heart be right, it is no matter which way the head lies.' Then, at two strokes, the wise white head fell, and one of the brightest geniuses that England ever saw was offered up; a fruitless sacrifice to the cause of an impossible alliance with the power whose arrogance he had dared to withstand. He had made the fatal mistake of supposing that the high-handed traditions of Elizabeth maintained their potency under the sway of James.

The day after his death Lady Raleigh wrote a sad little letter to her brother, asking him to allow her 'to berri the worthi boddi of my nobell hosban, Sur Walter Raleigh, in your chorche at Beddington. . . . God hold me in my wites'; but for some reason, now unknown, the headless corpse was buried within the chancel of St Margaret's, Westminster. What ultimately became of the head is uncertain; but it was long preserved by Lady Raleigh, and on her death by her son, Carew, in whose grave at West Horsley in Surrey it is believed it was interred.

A groan had involuntarily burst from the crowd as the axe fell. The groan was echoed all over England as the news spread. The Dean of Westminster was premature when he wrote a week after : 'Now it is blowen over, and he is almost forgotten,' for Raleigh embodied in the minds of the people their long fostered hatred of the Spaniards, and he became in his death far more popular than ever he had been in life. A generation had arisen which knew him not in his insolent splendour ; his long stay in the Tower, and the talk of his mystic and profound activities there, had made him something of a popular hero, even before his death ; and thenceforward the men who had hounded him to his doom were marked down for public reprobation. If the idea of a Spanish match was unpopular before, it became doubly hateful now, and soon James himself saw the mistake he had made. He was cunning and crafty, but he was dealing with a power far more crafty still, and had been bullied into parting with his choicest merchandise before exacting the price. In vain he tried when it was too late to appreciate his wares and exact an equivalent. He told the Spaniards that he had put Raleigh to death principally to give them satisfaction, and they would be looked upon as the most unworthy persons in the world if they did not act sincerely now. He pointed out to them how he had strained the affections of his people in putting to death a man 'who was so able to have done him service. Yet, to give them content, he hath not spared him, when by preserving him he might have given great satisfaction to his subjects, and had at command upon all occasions as useful a man as served any prince in Christendom.' But it was too late for James to praise Raleigh now. The Spaniards had gained their point; the King of England had admitted that all South America was sacred to them, had shown to the world that he accepted an inferior position, had sacrificed one of his most gifted subjects, and was outwitted in the payment of the price for the humiliation of his country. This is not the place to recount the ridiculous fiasco of the Spanish match, which made James and his son the laughing stock of Europe; but before the King's death it must have been patent to him, as it was to all the world, that Raleigh had been sacrificed in vain, and that the King's base compliance to arrogant demands had reduced England again to a secondary place amongst the nations, from which the genius of Elizabeth had raised it.

A recent biographer of Raleigh has remarked how much less considerable were his actual achievements than his undoubted gifts, that in action he had generally failed, and that not a single one of the great aims of his life was successfully carried through by him. He was, in truth, a man of the very highest intellectual gifts, but whose moral nature was infinitely inferior to them. In this he was typical of the age in which he lived. The great Queen, who struck the keynote of the period, suffered from a similar disproportion of the two sides of her nature, and many of the greatest minds that surrounded her were allied to dwarfed moral attributes. The very intensity and vitality of Raleigh's character exaggerated in him this disparity. He was physically brave beyond compare, and yet he begged for bare life like a very coward. He was insolent, vain and domineering to the last degree, and yet he could cringe and snivel abjectly at the least ill-fortune that befell him. He was greedy, unprincipled and rapacious, and yet he squandered his fortune lavishly on his great patriotic scheme of colonisation, by which he personally could hardly hope to gain. His contemporaries utterly disbelieved either in his honesty or his truth, and yet his noble written protestations seem to bear the absolute stamp of veracity upon them. With all his vast ability, he had not that magnetic moral strength that attracts men to a leader in moments of defeat, and enables him to retrieve reverse by victory. At the moment of failure, in the great crisis of his fortune, during the last Guiana voyage, he crumbled down hopelessly, and could only recriminate and lament, whilst his men fell away from him because he was unable to lead them, and he actually returned home a prisoner in his own cabin.

His great misfortune was that he became a royal favourite. In the purely intellectual domain he would have been eminent, even in an age which possessed a Shakspeare and a Bacon. The reason why he is so much more popular with posterity than he was with his contemporaries, is that the former judge him chiefly by his writings, the product of his brain, whilst the latter were necessarily more closely in contact with the actions of his life, the outcome of his weaker moral and physical nature.

But judge him how we may, we cannot deny him a commanding place in a grand and spacious age. Even if his faults were greater than they were, his love and faith in the future of England as the mighty mother of empires and the mistress of the seas, demand for him the judgment that he was a towering Englishman, and died for a great ideal.

INDEX

A

- AFRICAN POSSESSIONS, Source of Portuguese, 2.
 Alligators in Orinoco River, 158.
 American possessions, 2.
 Anarchy, Reign of, on the seas, 7.
 Anjou, Duke of, Elizabeth's flirtation with, 36; crowned at Antwerp, 39.
 Antonio, Don, pretender to Portuguese crown, 100.
 'Apologie for the Voyage to Guiana,' Ref. to, 349, 397.
Ark-Raleigh, The, 50, 94.
 Armada, Spanish, Cause of defeat of, 4; coming of the, 88, 90; destruction of the, 92.
 Aremberg, Count, Flemish Ambassador, 256, 257, 262, 266, 269, 274.
 Avila, Admiral Menendez de, 20.
 Azores Expedition, 118; sailing of, 205; second sailing of, 206; return of, 211.

B

- BABINGTON CONSPIRACY, The, 49.
 Bailey, Captain, deserts Guiana Expedition, 329; examined by James I., 335; his charges against Raleigh refuted, 357.
Bark-Raleigh, The, 60.
 Barry, Lord, Raleigh's endeavour to capture, 25.

- Beaumont, French Ambassador, 264, 270.
 Berreo, Spanish Governor of Trinidad, 150-154, 172, 173, 175, 177.
 Bloody Tower, The, Raleigh confined in, 282.
 Blount, Sir Christopher, 215, 222.
Bonaventure, The, 119.
 Britain, her place amongst nations, 2.
 British Empire, future and past, 1.
 Brooke, George, 254, 255, 259, 271, 273.
 Brownists, The, a dissenting sect, 137.
 Buckingham, Duke of, his aid enlisted for Raleigh, 306; supports James I. against Raleigh, 380.
 Burr, Walter, bookseller, 296.
 'Bye' treason, 255, 259, 260, 267.

C

- CABOTS, The, fail to reach Cathay, 4.
 Cadiz, Attack on, 185; capture of, 191, 193; burning of Spanish vessels at, 196.
 Car, Robert, obtains the Sherborne estate, 290.
 Caravel, Description of, 3.
 Carew, Sir George, cousin to Raleigh, 229.
 Carew, Sir Peter, 8, 12.

- Carlile, Captain, with Raleigh and others, petitions Elizabeth, 19 ; a follower of Raleigh, 68.
- Cecil, Sir Robert, 201 et seq. ; his intrigues with James VI., 239 ; his explanation of Raleigh's arrest, 253 ; helps Lady Raleigh 282 ; death of, as Earl of Salisbury, 294.
- Champernoun, Sir Arthur, 8.
- Champernoun, Gawen, Raleigh's cousin, 16, 17.
- Charles V. and French kings, Wars between, 6.
- Chatillon, Cardinal, 16.
- Chesne, Sieur de la, translator to the French Embassy, 398, 401, 403.
- Cloak story, Vagueness of, 34.
- Clyst Heath, Battle of, 11.
- Cobham, Lord, 257 et seq. ; his exculpation of Raleigh, 264 ; retractation of same, 271.
- Coke, Attorney-General, 266 et seq.
- Colonial Empire, First practical suggestion of a, 19.
- Colonies, Difficulty of establishing, 140.
- Columbus, Triumph of, 3 ; repulsed by Henry VII., 4.
- Compulsory tillage, Act for, 228.
- Condé, Death of, in 1569, 17.
- Cornish sailors, Voyages of, 6.
- Cotton MSS., The, 241.

D

- DES MARETS, French Ambassador, 320, 321.
- Desmonds, Confiscated lands of the, 42.
- Desmond, John of, Hanging of, 30.
- Desmond Rebellion, The, 22 ; Philip II's. help for, 23 ; still in existence, 25 ; got under, 30.
- Destiny*, The, Raleigh's flagship, 320, 360, 380, 395.

- Devonshire, Hatred of people of, towards Spaniards, 11.
- Devonshire sailors, Voyages of, 6.
- Digby, Sir John, successor to Sherborne estates, 330, 335-7.
- 'Discoverie of Guiana,' Ref. to, 170.
- Drake, Sir Francis : Expedition to West Indies, 70, 71 ; arrival at Virginia, 79 ; Virginian colonists return with, 80 ; arrival in England, 82 ; sinks ships in Cadiz harbour, 89 ; captures the San Felipe, 89 ; and Spanish Armada, 93 ; in command of sea force of Portuguese expedition, 99 ; disastrous end of West Indies Expedition, 181.

E

- ELIZABETH, Queen : Navy during time of, 3 ; commerce of merchant service at beginning of reign, 6 ; strength of navy at commencement of reign, 6 ; national policy of, 7 ; secretly receives Sir Humphrey Gilbert, 19 ; Raleigh's first favourable impression on, 33 ; her flirtations with the Duke of Anjou and Jean de Simier, 36 ; conspiracy against, 44 ; Essex, the favourite of, 51 ; tobacco anecdote of, 84 ; quarrels with Essex, 201 ; her repugnance to countenance a successor to the crown, 230 ; death of, 246.
- Empire, Responsibilities of, 2.
- English Channel infested with privateers, 6.
- English crown, Right of accession to, 230 et seq.
- English Protestants persecuted by Spaniards, 7.
- English seamen, Efficiency of, 4.
- English ships, Superior build of, 4.

Essex, Earl of: Elizabeth's favourite, 51; on board the Swiftsure, 100; restored to favour, 102; marriage, 117; quarrels with Elizabeth, 201; friendship with Raleigh, 202; in command of Azores Expedition, 205; return to England, 211; insolent to Elizabeth, 212; petty spite against Raleigh, 213; accepts supreme command in Ireland, 214; treachery of, 216; arrest of, 216; set at liberty, 220; trial and execution of, 223 et seq.

Essex plot, Formation and collapse of, 221 et seq.

Evesham's, John, account of privateering, 81.

F

FARDELL, the Manor House of Raleigh's father, 10.

Fasts, Abolition of, 6.

Fayal, Raleigh's attack on, 208.

Febre, Le, physician to Charles II., 291.

Fernandez, Simon, pilot, 21, 64, 78.

Fitzgerald, Sir James, Execution of, 23.

Fitzwilliams, Sir William, Viceroy of Ireland, 103.

Florida, French and Spanish ill-feeling at, 20.

France, First religious War in, 16.

Francis I., his attempt to attack Isle of Wight, 48.

Frobisher, Sir John, Raleigh's vice-admiral, 124.

G

GARDEN TOWER, The, 287.

Gascoigne, Sir H. Gilbert's treatise published by, 68.

Geronimo, Bishop, Capture of library of, 197.

Gerrard, Sir George, 56.

Gilbert, Sir Humphrey, Raleigh's half-brother, 9; in command of English contingent at Flushing, 18; return to London, 19; with Raleigh and others petitions Elizabeth, 19; patent granted to in 1578, 21; Knollys' insult to, 21; in Galicia, 22; his brutal treatment of rebel Irish, 23; colonisation of North America, 54 et seq.; Raleigh's letter to, 61; Newfoundland annexed by, 62; death of, 63; Ref. to treatise of N.-W. passage, 68.

Gilbert, Sir John, half-brother to Raleigh, 195.

Golden Hinde, The, 52, 63.

Gondomar, Count de, Spanish Ambassador, 311, 316, 317, 322, 323, 326, 329 et seq., 335, 343, 357 et seq.

Gorges, Sir Arthur, cousin to Raleigh, 209.

'Great Cordial,' Raleigh's, 291.

Great Harry, The, 5.

Grenville, Sir Richard, with Raleigh and others, petitions the Queen, 19; in command of Virginian Expedition, 71; at Mosquito Bay, 72; arrival at Wokoken, 73; first conflict with natives, 73; returns to England, 74; capture of a rich prize, 74; return to England, 80; made vice-admiral of Azores Expedition, 118; death of, 122.

Grey, Lord, Viceroy of Ireland, 23; offended with Raleigh, 30, 32.

Guiana: First thoughts of colonising, 142; legend of, 144; Antonio de Berreo's expedition to, 145; Raleigh's expeditions to, 146, 148, 176, 301, 313; Raleigh's plan to conquer, 171; Spanish expedition to, 173; details of Raleigh's third expedition, 324; Raleigh's fleet starts for, 326; sickness in Raleigh's expedition, 337; failure of, 354. Gunpowder Plot, Raleigh suspected of complicity in, 289.

H

HARIOT, Thomas, mathematician, 68; first Englishman to adopt smoking, 78; his praises of smoking and tobacco, 83; his treatise on Virginia, 85; accusations of Atheism against, 111.
 Harvey, Sir George, Governor of the Tower, 263, 268.
 Hatfield, Poems by Raleigh discovered at, 107.
 Hatton, Lord Chancellor, 36, 44.
 Heneage, Sir Thomas, one of Elizabeth's lovers, 36, 38.
 Henry, son of James I., his admiration of Raleigh, 292 et seq.; death of, 295.
 Henry VII.: Columbus repulsed by, 4; navy improved by, 4.
 Henry VIII., Foundation of naval supremacy laid by, 4.
History of the World, Reference to, 142, 295, 299.
 Howard, Lord Henry, a spy in pay of Spain, 240.
 Howard, Admiral Lord Thomas, 60, 182, 184, 187, 190, 205.
 Huguenots, Cardinal Chatillon solicits aid for, 16.

I

IRELAND, Scheme to invade, 204;

failure of the action, 211; Essex in supreme command, 214.

J

JAMES I. succeeds to crown of England, 246; changes made by, 250; pardons Cobham, Gray and Markham, 274; his strictures on the third Guiana Expedition, 315.

Jarnac, Battle of, 7.

Jonson, Ben, 297, 299.

K

KEMYS, Captain, in command of Guiana Expedition, 176; account of his voyage, 179 et seq.; in search of silver mines, 344, 346, 347; suicide of, 353.

King, Captain, 396-400.

L

LAKE, Sir Thomas, his letter to Count Gondomar, 334.

Lane, Ralph, first Governor of Virginia, 74.

Leicester, Earl of, 18; Raleigh's letter to, in 1856, 49; decline of his influence with Elizabeth, 50.

Lennox, Duke of, 240.

Lisbon, Expedition to, in 1589, 99 et seq.

Lismore Castle, Re-building of, 102.

M

MACKWORTH, Captain, 24.

Madre de Dios, Capture of, 129.

'Main' treason, 259.

Manourie, a French spy on Raleigh, 396, 417.

Mary, Queen, Poverty of, 5; her marriage with Philip, 11.; her will, 231.

Mary Rose, The, 5, 8.

Maurice of Nassau, 219.

Mendoza, Spanish Ambassador in Paris, 44-48, 58, 70.

Minerals, various sorts discovered by Raleigh, 164, 167.

Ministers, English, in pay of Spain, 271.

Montes, Roque de, Governor of Cumana, 173, 174; quarrel with Berreo, 175.

Montoncourt, Battle of, 17.

Morequito, Guiana chief, 160, 161.

Morgan, Sir William, 27, 46.

Mountjoy, Lord, in command of troops in Azores Expedition, 205; succeeds Essex in Ireland, 215.

Moyle, his life saved by Raleigh,
26.

N

NATIVES at Virginia, First conflict with, 73.

Natives, Cruelties by Spaniards
on, 67.

Naval Renaissance during reign of Elizabeth, 3.

Navy, Foundation of supremacy of, laid by Henry VIII., 4; unfit for sea in 1555, 5; strength of at beginning of Elizabeth's reign, 6.

Newfoundland annexed by Sir
Humphrey Gilbert, 62.

Norris, Sir John, 18; in command of forces in Portuguese expedition, 99.

North America, Colonisation of,
54 et seq.

Northumberland, Earl of, his letter to James VI., 245.

O

OLIVARES, Count de, 237.

Orange, Cape, 340

Orinoco Indians, Description of, 156.

Orinoco River, 155; entered by Raleigh, 159

Orinoco Expedition, 344; failure and return of, 352.

Ormond, Earl of, Deputy of Munster, 23; cowardice of, 26; his dislike of Raleigh, 35.

P

PALOMEQUE DE ACUÑA, governor of San Thomé, 352, 358, 359.

Parker, Captain: His story of Orinoco River Expedition, 346.

Peckham, Sir George, with Raleigh and others petitions Elizabeth, 19; receives power to explore, 56.

Perez, Antonio, 182.

Perrot, Sir Thomas, 18.

Philip II. of Spain: His force to help Desmond rebels, 23; they crave quarter, 24; are slaughtered, 24; prepares Armada, 88; attempt to interrupt his silver fleet, 118 et seq.

Piers, Captain, 27.

Plague, The, of 1603, 265.

Portuguese African possessions,
Source of, 2.

'Prerogative of Parliament,' The, 300.

Prest, Agnes, Martyrdom of, 12.

'Priests' (or 'Bye') treason, 255, 259, 267.

Primrose, The, Kidnapping exploits of, 71.

Privateering, Flourishing time of,
61, 75, 81.

Prize money of 1591 Expedition, 123.

Protestants, Persecution of, by Spaniards, 7.

Q

QUESADA, Father, 194, 195.

R

RALEGH, Lady (née Elizabeth Throgmorton), 125; a faithful wife, 127; her letters to Sir Robert Cecil, 147, 178.

Raleigh, Katherine Champernoun, Raleigh's mother, Courageous act of, 12.

Raleigh, Sir Walter: Parents and ancestors, 8; skill in maritime affairs, 8; youth of, 9, 15; family, 10; birth-place, 10; birth, 15; at Oxford, 16; joins the Huguenot forces, 17; a member of the Middle Temple, 18; reference to his trial, 18; riotous life in London, 18; quarrels with Sir Thomas Perrot and is lodged in Fleet, 18; with others petitions Queen Elizabeth, 19; patent granted to, 21; troubles of first expedition, 21, 22; receives a captain's commission, 22; in Ireland, 23; Poet Spenser, friend of, 24; with Captain Mackworth slaughters Philip II.'s expedition, 24; quartered at Cork, 25; endeavour to capture Lord Barry, 25; narrow escape of, 26; joint government of Munster, 27; letter to Earl of Leicester, 27; impeachment of Ormond, 28; bravery of, 29; captures Lord Roche, 29; snubbed by Lord Grey, 30; return to London, 30; character of at,

30, 31; attraction of, 32; first favourable impression on Elizabeth, 33; cloak story, 34; first royal favour, 35; jealousy of Elizabeth's lovers, 36; gorgeous attire of, 38; plans for extending empire, 38; study, 39; granted use of Durham House, 40; emoluments, 41; rapaciousness, 42; share of Desmond estates, 42; receives Lord Wardenship of the Stannaries, 43; made Vice-Admiral of the West, 44; becomes Captain of the Queen's Guard, 44; supposed conspirator against Elizabeth, 45; interviews with Sarmiento, 47; in league with the Spanish, 49; and Babington Conspiracy, 49; wealth largely increased, 50; his ships, 60; his letter to Gilbert, 61; fresh letters patent granted to, 64; colonising ideas of, 68; an M. P. for Devonshire, 69; colonising patent obtained, 69; a shareholder in Drake's expedition to the West Indies; prevented from taking part in Virginia Expedition, 71; interested in privateering business, 81; introduces tobacco, 82; spends lavishly for public good, 86; unpopular with the crowd, 86; fourth expedition to Virginia planned, 87; prepares for the Armada, 90; commissioned to raise 2000 men, 91; Mayor of Youghal, 91; strengthens Portland defences, 92; reference to History of the World, 93; unmerited blame on account of Virginian colonists, 95; patriotic glory of, 96; squabble with Earl of Essex, 99; receives gold chain from Elizabeth, 102; retires from the Court, 102; generosity to men of letters, 104; meets Spenser again, 104; his position as a poet, 106 et seq.; some of his MS. found at Hatfield, 107; disliked by courtiers and people, 110; accusation of Atheism against, 111; His Life of Queen Elizabeth, 114; refs. to The History of the World, 115; Elizabeth's chief favourite, 1890, 117; debarred from joining Azores Expedition, 118; admiral of 1592 Expedition, 124; rumours of his marriage, 125; failure of expedition and return to London, 126; his arrest, 126; marriage, 127; released on parole, 130; loss on 1592 Expedition, 133; at liberty, 133; parliamentary duties, 134 et seq.; obtains estate of Sherborne, 137; ref. to 'Cynthia,' 137; birth of a son, 138; friends and enemies of, 138, 139; revenues and expenditure, 141; his expedition to Guiana, 146 et seq.; sailing of the expedition, 148; at Trinidad, 149; captures and burns San Joseph, 151; makes Governor Berreo a prisoner, 151; crosses the Bay of Guanipa, 154; on the way to Orinoco River, 155; his description of Orinoco Islands, 155; hardships on Orinoco River, 156 et seq.; meets Guiana chiefs, 160, 161; creates good impression on Indians, 166; is presented with chief's son, 166; return to England, 168; disbelief in his statements, 170; plan to conquer Guiana, 171; jealousy of Spanish

Government, 173; second expedition to Guiana, 176; his difficulties with his seamen, 183; his account of capture of Cadiz, 191; wounded at Cadiz, 193; his return to England, 198; again in favour at Court, 202; his friendship with Cecil and Essex, 202; reference to Opinion upon the Spanish Alarum, 204; Rear-Admiral of Azores Expedition, 205; attack on Fayal, 208; capture of Villa Dorta, 209; Essex indignant at his action, 210; return to England, 211; broken health, 212; petty spite of Essex to, 213, 214; his famous letter to Cecil, 217; appointed Governor of Jersey, 221; cruel slanders in reference to Essex, 225; multifarious duties, 226; beginning of disagreements with Cecil, 229; an enemy in Lord Henry Howard, 240; further slander on his religion, 244; first meeting with James I., 248; commencement of downfall, 249; has to quit Durham House, 251; denounced by Cobham, 257; detained in the Tower, 258; attempts suicide, 262; his means of communication with Cobham, 263; Cobham's exculpation of, 264; beginning of trial of, 265; found guilty and sentenced to death, 269, 270; reprieved, 278; correspondence of, 278 et seq.; confined in the Bloody Tower, 282; severe straits of, 282; his petitions to the King, 285 et seq.; literary labours in the Tower, 288; loss of Sherborne estates, 289; chemical and medical ex-

- periments, 289; his 'great cordial,' 291; references to his literary labours, 296 et seq.; his desires for expansion of the Empire, 301 et seq.; his many efforts to regain freedom to explore, 305; release of, 307; preparations for the Guiana Expedition, 312; details of the Guiana Fleet, 324; starting of the Guiana Fleet, 326; arrival at the Canaries, 327; Captain Bailey deserts the fleet, 329; arrival and kindly treatment at Gomera, 337, 338; illness of, 338; arrival at Cape Orange, 340; at Trinidad, 345; his son killed 346, 349; failure of the Guiana Expedition, 354; a mutiny on board, 357; return to Plymouth, 360; arrest of, 370, 395; special councils on, 372, 378; his letter to Lord Carew, 385; his account of the taking of San Thomé, 386; is prevailed on to escape and returns, 396; another escape arranged, 398; and frustrated, 400; again confined in the Tower, 400; his letters, 404; last trial of, 406; last interview with his wife, 417; his last speech, 414, 416; death of, 417; sketch of his character, 419.
- Raleigh, Walter, of Fardell, father of Sir Walter, 8; manor house of, 10; a pronounced Protestant, 10; nearly killed by rustics, 11; imprisoned in a church tower, 11; carries Sir Peter Carew to France, 12.
- Religion, First War of, in France, 16.
- Revenge*, The, 94.
- Revenge* and San Felipe, Fight between, 120, 121.
- Ribaut, Captain, of Dieppe, 20.
- 'Rising of the West,' 11.
- Roanoak, Murder of garrison at, 87.
- Roche, Lord, Capture of, 29.
- Roebuck*, The, 94; captures the Madre de Dios, 129; disablement of 206.
- S
- ST LEGER, Sir Warham, Deputy of Munster, 28.
- St Martin's le Grand, Dutchmen established at, 135.
- San Felipe*, The, and Revenge, fight between, 120, 121; at Cadiz, 189.
- San Joseph taken and burnt by Raleigh, 151.
- San Thomé, Original site of, 174; attack on, 346 et seq.
- Sancy Diamond, The, 99.
- Sarmiento de Acuña. See Gondomar.
- Sarmiento, Governor of Spanish Settlements in Patagonia, 46; has several interviews with Raleigh, 47; captured by Huguenots, 47.
- Savage, Sir Arthur, 244.
- 'Schismatics,' The, 55.
- Scarnafissi, Count, Savoyard Ambassador, 318.
- Seamen, English, Efficiency of, 4.
- Ships, English, Superior build of, 4.
- Sidney, Sir Philip, 105; marriage of his widow, 117.
- Sidonia, Medina, Governor of Andalusia, 187, 194, 196.
- Simier, Jean de, Elizabeth's flirtation with, 36.
- Smoking introduced into England, 82.
- Spain: Loss of Naval omnipotence, 3, 4; decline of power, 199; hopeless disorganisation in, 204.

Spaniards, Persecution of English Protestants by, 7 ; hatred by Devonshire people, 11.

Spanish Settlement burnt at Venezuela, 168.

Spanish treason, 259, 260.

Spanish troops, Plan to introduce into England, 261.

Spenser, Edmund, Secretary to Lord Grey, 23 ; meeting with Raleigh, 104 ; pension bestowed on, 106.

Squirrel, The, Wreck of, 63.

Stannaries Parliament, The, 43.

Stuart, Lady Arabella, 233, 239.

Stukeley, Sir Lewis, 75, 382, 395, 397-400, 413, 417.

T

TASSIS, Don Juan Bautista de, Spanish Ambassador, 274.

Throgmorton, Sir Arthur, brother-in-law to Raleigh, 195.

Tobacco, Hariot the first to adopt, 78 ; introduced into England, 82.

Toparimaca, Guiana chief, 160.

Topiawari, Guiana chief, 161, 162, 165, 177.

Trinidad, Spanish Settlement at, 173.

Tyrone Insurrection, The, 213.

V

VENEZUELA, Spanish Settlements burnt at, 168.

Vera, Colonel de, in command of Spanish Expedition to Guiana, 173.

Villa Dorta, Capture of, 209.

Villiers, George (Duke of Buckingham), 306.

Virginia : Taken, 64 ; named by Elizabeth, 69 ; colonising expedition sails for, 71 ; arrival of expedition, 73 ; first conflict with natives at, 73 ; rich state of, 77 ; quarrels among settlers, 78 ; arrival of Drake at, 79 ; return of colonists, 80 ; Hariot's treatise on, 85 ; fourth expedition to, 87 ; John White, Governor of, 87 ; settlement murdered, 96 ; help refused by Elizabeth, 97 ; another colony established, 303.

W

WAAD, Sir William, Governor of the Tower 288.

War of Religion, First, in France, 16.

Wars between Charles V. and French kings, 6.

Whiddon, Captain Jacob, 148, 149.

White, John : Governor of Virginia, 87 ; return to England, 88 ; again starts for Virginia, 95.

Wight, Isle of, Attempted attack on, in 1544, 4, 8.

William the Silent, 39 ; his message to Elizabeth, 40.

Williams, Sir Roger, 100.

Wilson, Sir Thomas, spy on Raleigh, 403.

Winchester, Trial of Raleigh at, 265 et seq.

Wokoken, Island of, 65 ; arrival of colonising expedition, 73.

Wood, Anthony à, 16.

Wyatt's, Sir Thomas, rebellion, 11.

Colston & Coy. Limited, Printers, Edinburgh.

LIGHT

+

BR163H

Hume

Sir Walter Raleigh.

1

